I also wish to express my thanks to Bishop Joseph K. Kibucwa of ACK Kirinyaga Diocese for praying with me from beginning to the end of this study, giving it the blessings it now enjoys. Likewise, a vote of gratitude to the staff and students of St Andrew's College, Kabare for your understanding, inspiration and prayers. ABSTRACT

The thesis investigates the influence of early Keswick theology of sanctification in the socio-ethical life of the East African Revival Movement (EARM), 1930-2015, in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya Region within the framework of missio Dei. It starts with the proposition that early Keswick theology of sanctification is behind the beliefs and practices of walking in the light leading to splits within the EARM that affects church mission.

This study poses one primary question, namely, does the Keswick theology of sanctification contribute to the socio-ethical understanding of walking in the light in the EARM and thus influence the mission of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region? Following historical and empirical analysis, it has been claimed that walking in the light has led to split in EARM. The study mainly uses qualitative research to document information from primary and secondary sources to analyse historical and empirical data of the current phenomenon. The principal data collection method is focused group discussion and a one-on-one interview. The research employs guided questions to elicit perspectives of respondents’ view of the prevailing situation. The data reveals six themes which are compared with historical themes to culminate into three clusters of conversion, worship style, and moral codes which hinges analytical summary of the current historical and empirical situation and informs undertaking to the preferred trend of walking in the light in EARM.

The study has establishes that Keswick theology of sanctification finds affinity with East African socio-historical circumstances which enabled Keswick theology and East Africa sociological worldview to have some significant exchange of concepts and meanings primarily from the viewpoints of exclusion and inclusion. However, the study found that Anglican Church scholarship mainly explores EARM from historical, cultural and theological perspectives and thus have not documented any scholarship on its influence on the walking in the light in the mission of God, particularly in the Mount Kenya region. Indeed the majority of respondents except main stakeholders depicted ignorance of Keswick theology. As a result, the missiological tenets challenges walking in the light fundamentals and motivates Brethren’s participation in the mission of God. Thus when walking in the light is critiqued against the missiological foundations fall short of the mission mandate of the involvement in the missio Dei due to exclusive disposition. Consequently, when the current trend is placed against the mission statement, it is apparent that the prevailing situation of walking in the light has hindered mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya. Thus, ACK mission demonstrates the preferred scenario that suggests a change on the part of Brethren from exclusive to the inclusive predisposition of mutual Christian's coexistence.

CHAPTER 1. BACKGROUND AND PROBLEM STATEMENT

1.1 INTRODUCTION

This study sought to examine the extent to which the early Keswick theology of sanctification had influenced the socio-ethical model for walking in the light in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region while catering for the East African Revival Movement’s (EARM) growth. As suggested by the acronym EARM, the revival fellowship permeates the Eastern Africa countries mostly within the mainstream Protestant churches. The scope of the study was, however, confined within four selected Anglican Dioceses in Mount Kenya region\(^1\). Although it seemed wide, this is a local area on the slopes of Mount Kenya. The researcher used a historic-analytical design to address the research objectives, which involved both primary and secondary methods of data collection.

1.2 RESEARCH BACKGROUND AND THE PROBLEM STATEMENT

1.2.1 Background

The word Mission is one of the rare multifaceted phrases in this study. Its close resemblance could be the Turkana of Kenya tradition of casting away of sins to the setting sun [to the west]. The mileage theory implied in the casting away to the West could be applied to the intricacy of mission nuance. Even when perceived in the light of God as the prime mission mover, the complexity persists because God’s mission is not a preserve of Christians. Thus, Richebacher (2003: 596) advises Christians to treat mission of triune God as an aspect they cannot bring to people of other faiths because of God, their creator, is already at work in them. The researcher will, therefore, seek to contextualize the concept of mission from the Christian viewpoint to avoid misrepresentation in substance, application, and outcome.

So, this study sought to assess the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification for the socio-ethical life of walking in the light\(^2\) in the EARM, Anglican dioceses of Mount Kenya region. The focus was the Anglican Dioceses of Mount Kenya region, in the light of God’s mission, in the four selected Dioceses of Mt Kenya central, Kirinyaga, Embu and Mt Kenya West.

\(^1\) Mount Kenya region comprises nine Dioceses: Kirinyaga, Embu, Mbeere, Meru, Mt Kenya Central, Mt Kenya West, Mt Kenya South, Murang’a South and Thika.

\(^2\) This concept, as used in the context of EARM, means transparency and openness (Ward and Wild-Wood, 2012:215).
1.2.2  Historical overview of the prevailing situation

Revival in East Africa was first preached mainly to people who were Christians in the sense that they were already baptized, confirmed and in church activities. Gitari (n.d:1) observes that EARM professes that baptism and confirmation are not enough for salvation. To be assured of salvation one needs to accept Jesus Christ as a personal saviour. The way to salvation is to realize that one is a sinner, and is convicted of his or her sins. One realizes sins are taken away at the cross of Christ. It is by surrendering to Jesus and publicly confessing sins that one is received in the revival fellowship by singing of the Tukutendereza³ chorus.

The revival teaches that a saved person needs daily sanctification. This is attained by a life of daily walk with the Lord⁴, regular examination of one’s heart, and repentance. Barrington-Ward (2012:53) at Birmingham confessed of a challenging encounter with an English lady who had arrived from Uganda and asked if she could be in the light. This is because a Brethren⁵ knows that one is living a sanctified life when one walks in the light, i.e. regularly attends a fellowship meeting and gives a testimony as opposed to spiritually-cold Christians.

A weekly fellowship gives each person an opportunity to share with the Brethren⁶ the kind of life he has lived since the last fellowship meeting. A Christian who neither attends the fellowship meetings nor walks in the light is thought to be lukewarm or as Ward and Wild-Wood (2012:215) observe, is considered not saved. This scenario could justify the consequent split in the revival following the reading of Ephesians 5:14 (Nthamburi, 1991:117). A section of EARM interpreted this text to mean anyone involved in socio-ethical activities is spiritually dead and needs to arise from the dead. Thus, spiritually dead Christians are not sanctified and therefore not walking in the light (Kamau, 2001:33). This resulted in the prevailing two factions of EARM in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region.

1.2.3  Definition of Concepts

1.2.3.1  Socio-ethical life

The phrase socio-ethical life will be used to refer to the day to day life of the community. Wright (2006:364) imagines ethical obedience from the perspective of walking in the way(s) of the Lord. He works with moral obedience in the light of the covenant relationship with God that influences the relationship with the community, thus a social-ethical life. Bosch (2011:418) adds

³ Tukutendereza is a Luganda name for “we praise” and is used as a greeting and signature song of all members of EARM.
⁴ Used interchangeably with “walking in the light”.
⁵ A member of EARM
⁶ The other members of EARM, who call themselves “Brethren”.

a concept of justice about evangelism and social responsibility in what he terms a second credibility test. EARM seems to fall short of this test in its ethical formation and obedience that appears to override Gospel values. It tends to lay particular emphasis on evangelism and is not quite sensitive to providing other humanitarian needs like food and shelter. Senyoni (2013:4-8) describes the concept of walking in the light, as one of the beliefs and practices that Revivalists have bequeathed to the church today. The interpretation and application of this concept justify EARM’s open and transparent lifestyle that influences the Mount Kenya community’s public confession/testimony.

1.2.3.2 Keswick theology

According to Naselli (2008:29), this phrase denotes five days of progressive teaching commonly referred to as spiritual clinic. Naselli further contends that this teaching characterized early Keswick conventions (1875 – 1920) that had a stereotyped sequence (2008:29). This early Keswick theology will be the lens through which the prevalent model of walking in the light that has led to discord in the revival in Kenya will be assessed.

1.2.3.3 Missio Dei (mission of God)

This concept is not only generative, but its Trinitarian perspective further compounds its intricacy. In the light of missio Dei’s generative character, this researcher might have to agree with Moreau’s (2004:73) sentiments, “Thus, at least for now among evangelical writers, knowing how a particular person uses a term is more important than knowing what the term means in the larger discipline of missiology.” This is because the term missio Dei is bedeviled by multiple meanings informed by contextual viewpoints. It seems like there is not a commonly agreed on a definition. However, Bosch (2011:10) provides a working definition that guides this study. He defines the missio Dei as “God’s self-revelation as the one who loves the world, God’s involvement in and with the world, the nature and activity of God, which embraces both the church and the world, and in which the church is privileged to participate.”

1.2.4 Problem statement

At the core of this study is the socio-ethical influence of the concept and practice designated by the catch-cry walking in the light that is believed to have led to the split in EARM. The dynamics

7 “A proclamation that does not hold forth the promises of the justice of the kingdom to the poor of the earth is a caricature of the Gospel: but Christian participations in the struggles for justice which does not point towards the promises of the kingdom also makes a caricature of a Christian understanding of justice” (Bosch, 2011:418).
8 Keswick is a town in the Lake District in NW England where in 1875 was held the first convention (Naselli, 2008:17).
of this influence appear to resonate with early Keswick theology⁹ and hindered mission in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. This study, therefore, was to systematically explore various facets that comprised the problem of this study.

1.2.4.1 General Topic

Since the Triune God is actively involved in and with the world, the church is called to join in His mission to investigate and implement the mission mandate. This study falls in the field of missiology and thus will seek to bring to the fore the interaction of God, creating the world and the church. The understanding of sanctification from the perspective of Keswick teachings, contribute to the prevailing situation in EARM and must be researched. The socio-ethical situation of walking in the light pervades EARM in Mount Kenya region impacting on community relationships. The ensuing “holier than thou” attitude segregates a section of the Christians from fellowship by failing to live a transparent and open life.

1.2.4.2 How the specific topic is relevant to the general topic

The 18th and 19th-century revivals and awakenings have a bearing on the mission trend that saw the beginning of the Keswick movement in 1875, in England. The ensuing Keswick teachings have been viewed by scholars like Stanley (1977:10-11) and Ward (2012:19) to have influenced social-ethical behaviour observed in EARM today.

Furthermore, the student movements in the early 20th century England, reckoned to have been propelled by faith missions of the day resonated well with the Keswick teachings (Reed, 2007:57). These instructions filtered to Eastern Africa mainly through the British evangelical missions (Stanley, 1977:10) with little concern for the theological meaning of the term sanctification resulting in a blurred understanding of church mission.

1.2.4.3 What is already known about the topic?

A review of the available literature is vital as one commences research. Smith (2008:130) emphasizes the importance of isolating academic writings related to the topic to see what has been done and what questions remain unanswered. This helps to identify data sources that other researchers have used and thus contributes to bringing to the fore a research gap.

⁹Kevin De Young (2010:4) recalls his high school days: “When I shared my Christian “testimony” in my high school and early college years, I would say something like this: “I was saved when I was eight years old, and I surrendered to Christ when I was thirteen. By ‘saved’ I meant that Jesus became my saviour and that I became a Christian. By ‘surrendered’ I meant that I finally gave full control of my life to Jesus as my Master and yielded to do whatever he wanted me to do.” This description outlines two levels of Christians and thus affects mission.
In the proposed research topic no sufficient study seemed to have been done to address the issues in question. Scholars like Kevin Ward, Emma Wild-Wood, John Karanja and others had written widely on EARM from the historical, cultural and socio-theological perspectives. Most of the investigations done in the research area in Kenya had attempted to address the question of the socio-ethical implications of the EARM dictum, walking in the light. However, none of them had written specifically on the Keswick theology influence on the socio-ethical model on the missio Dei. The following overview of selected available literature was pivotal.

1.2.4.3.1 Social-Ethical obedience: walking in the light in the early Keswick theology

Scholars such as Andrew Naselli (2010), Steve Barabas (2005) and others have attempted to provide biblical-theological discourses on ethical obedience that are critical to understanding the influence of Keswick theology on EARM’s socio-ethical life of walking in the light.

Naselli (2010) in his book, Let go and let God: A Survey and Analysis of Keswick Theology, observes that let go and let God teaching is not biblically sound because it creates two categories of Christians; on the one hand, saved and on the other hand, surrendered. Naselli’s view sheds light on the understanding of the research topic from a biblical and theological perspective. He brings to the fore Keswick’s erroneous monergistic perspective; let go and let God which could be attributed to the practice of socio-ethical obedience observable in EARM today.

Likewise, Barabas’ (2005) book, So Great Salvation: The History and Message of the Keswick Convention (regarded as a standard interpretation of Keswick theology) examines erroneous views of Keswick theology of sanctification. However, his views on mortification and vivification seem to misrepresent biblical views (2005:68-74). This will be demonstrated later in this study. Furthermore, the doctrine of second blessing connected with a quietist idea of sanctification by faith alone is unscriptural though Keswick distinctive and propagated it.

1.2.4.3.2 EARM social ethics of walking in the light: impact on Christian missionaries and implications for social responsibility.

John Church, [son to Joe Church] (2012) in his article “Personal experience of the Revival” in Kevin Ward (2012), The East African Revival (41-51) describes Balokole\(^\text{10}\) as full of spiritual awareness that astounded even missionaries. Lines and goal posts\(^{11}\) that governed the EARM were pre-set amounting to rigid rules, akin to walking in the light.

\(^{10}\) The revival movement came to be widely known in East Africa as the Balokole, which means the “saved ones in Luganda language”. The word became synonymous with the East African Revival – one of the most significant Christian movements in modern history.

Barrington-Ward (2012), once General Secretary of Church Missionary Society (CMS) and later Bishop of Coventry, UK, in his article, “The Revival through CMS Eyes” in Ward (2012), The East African Revival (54-60), provides a critical observation on EARM ethical practice of walking in the light. He draws attention to the dangerous element of withdrawal from the real life of the church and society, particularly the tendency to withdraw from social responsibility. He contends that the revival fellowship could be an exclusive group when the experience of the power of the Holy Spirit is made the basis of fellowship among members of the group while those who do not qualify remain outside it.

1.2.4.3.3 EARM social-ethics: walking in the light and its implications for the Anglican Church Mount Kenya region.

Jason Bruner (2012) in his article “Public Confession and the Moral Universe of the East African Revival” in the Studies in World Christianity (254-268) examines key themes in the public confession of personal sin like stealing, sexual indiscretions and witchcraft. The paper argues that the Brethren developed a common moral discourse through their public confessions and testimonies. Bruner highlights how the Brethren interacted with traditional taboos and social values. His views on public confession of sin shed light on the understanding of our research topic from a socio-ethical perspective model of walking in the light. Bruner further contends that public confession of sin allowed the revivalists to name particular threats to their spiritual and temporal lives while connecting them through a new sense of fellowship. The new fellowship was only enjoyed by those who had confessed the sinfulness of their past ways and thereby broken down barriers between the public self and private self.

In addition, Karanja (1999) in his book, Founding an African Faith\(^{12}\), while appreciating opposition to the practice of public confession by church leaders, observes that it suited the Kikuyu religious consciousness. This is because the public confession was an integral part of the Kikuyu religion and culture. He asserts that EARM’s public confession served to strengthen the Brethren’s resolve to live by the demands of their new faith. He points out that revival contributed much towards moral transformation in the Protestant churches in central Kenya\(^{13}\).

points out how the revival made the church in the central Kenya to survive and even to grow during the Mau Mau\textsuperscript{14} uprising (1951-1955). In his autobiography, \textit{Troubled but not Destroyed}, Gitari recounts that many members of the EARM “had refused to take the Mau Mau oath\textsuperscript{15} because they could not mix the blood of Jesus that has washed their sins away with that of goats” (2014: 185). He observes that the greatest strength of revival is the fact that Christians are challenged to examine their lives every day and to seek inward sanctification.

EARM had a rather focused mission since its arrival in Kenya in 1935/6, with some places, as noted by Mambo (1973:113) like Mombasa (1964) and Kikuyu (1970) realizing attendance of 20,000 and 30,000 people, respectively. This looks amazing because it has been said (Gitari, n.d:4) that around this time some cracks had begun within the Fellowship resulting in five distinctive schismatic groups: Arahuka (Arise), Simama (Stand), Mtama na Maji (Sorghum and Water), Thama (Exodus) and Kupaa (Rising up). The first two are still active while the rest are either defunct or inactive. The concern for this study will be Arise and Stand, not for comparative reasons but to understand the effect of Keswick theology on their conception of the socio-ethical life. Interpretation of the central biblical texts on the subject of sanctification particularly by Arise and Stand seem to have led to disension. Please see Annexure 1 for details on the particular hermeneutical and theological emphases that could have shaped EARM’s theology, spirituality, and ethics of each group.

The fundamental issue in this context had been the application of some biblical texts, for example, Ephesian 5:14 and see also, Luke 22:45-46 (Gitari, n.d:5) that encouraged Brethren to arise from sleep. As Peterson (1995:16) points out “inadequate attention has been paid to the use of holiness terminology in the New Testament and to passages which deal specifically with the subject of sanctification”. The interpretation and application of the Ephesians text sparked serious division in 1971 leading to Kufufuka\textsuperscript{16} and Simama\textsuperscript{17} holding their meetings at St Stephen’s Church, Nairobi on the first Sunday and the second Sunday of each month, respectively. In the Mount Kenya region, Kufufuka and Kusimama held their monthly meetings at Maragua and Murang’a cathedral, respectively (Gitari, n.d:5). Disparity in these factions was amplified in 2011\textsuperscript{18} in central Kenya.

\textsuperscript{16} Kufufuka or Kuzuzuka are Swahili names for Arise which originated from Blasio Kigozi when he challenged the sleeping church of Uganda to wake up (Nthamburi, 1991:117).

The fact that \textit{Arise} and \textit{Stand} rarely fellowship together baffles Christians who seek to protect the prevailing socio-ethical spirituality of walking in the light. Members of \textit{Arise} accuse those within the revival of being spiritually dead because they keep dogs, accept dowry or receive loans. \textit{Stand} disagrees with the interpretation of the Ephesian text and opposes \textit{Arise} almost in everything. The wrong use of this verse impacted the EARM, shaking its long history of monolithic spirituality.

1.2.4.5 How will this study build on what is already known and what gap it will address?

There is, arguably an underlying spirituality of \textit{Kufufuka} that does, in fact, reflect the researcher’s objective to explore EARM’s understanding of socio-ethical beliefs and practices that have characterized the EARM for over 50 years. This will be used to investigate how Keswick’s theology of sanctification is connected with the emergence of EARM’s socio-ethical concepts and practices of walking in the light in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. Superficial use of key passages on sanctification and holiness seems to have been one of the leading causes of the current walking in the light model that appears to set apart members of EARM not only from themselves but other Christians too. This categorization paved the way for the so-called two types of Christian scenario that impacts the church negatively and distorts what it ought to be in the light of \textit{missio Dei}.

The researcher, therefore, contended that some scholars such as Kevin Ward, John Karanja, and Esther Mombo seem to have had failed to notice the effect of sanctification theology as taught, understood and applied by EARM. Its application appeared to have influenced walking in the light model in the Anglican Diocese of Mount Kenya region. So, despite the growing interest in the 21st-century theological representation, no theologian had yet seriously examined the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification on EARM socio-ethical life of “walking in the light” in the context of \textit{missio} Dei in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. It appeared Keswick theology of sanctification led to legalism and excesses which are believed to have brought to fruition splits in the EARM.

\textsuperscript{18} \textit{Stand} held its convention in August at Kamuiru Boys Secondary School while \textit{Arise} held its own in December at Kabare Girls Secondary School attended by members from Rwanda, Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya. According to Mr Stanley Nyaga, a key leader of \textit{Arise}, \textit{Stand} did not attend.
1.2.4.6 State the specific problem that is the focus of this study

Historians of EARM traced its early beginnings to 1929 when Joe Church and Simeon Nisibambi started meeting regularly for prayer in Gahini, Rwanda (Reed, 2007:19; and Ward, 2012:3). They were revived and shared their experiences with Blasio Kigozi and Yosia Kinuka. The revival spread quickly to Uganda arriving in central Kenya in 1936. It flourished, as previously mentioned, until 1971 when a great rift grew among the brethren. An attempt at reconciliation has been futile to date.

The original message of Kufufuka was to encourage brethren to arise from sleep (Ephesians 5:14) and to be renewed inwardly. There is nothing unbiblical about this emphasis. The Kufufuka brethren erred by assuming that renewal means doing away with socio-ethical practices like acquiring loans, life insurance cover, paying and receiving dowry and keeping dogs to guard homesteads. Legalism had spoiled a real message. They assumed that a Christian is awakened if he/she does not partake in these practices and instead relies wholly on God’s providence.

These ideas resonate well with the Keswick teachings which Reed (2007:57) observes emphasized utter reliance on God rather than on human effort. Human means of raising money for the mission, for example, were discounted, as were human means of advancing in the Christian life; trust was all. These Christians have not only been raised from sleep but are on the glory train to heaven. This has had consequences on church mission. The members of Arise detached themselves from social activities claiming getting involved in them means one is spiritually dead, thus not in the light, while Stand observed these activities. This resemblance between Keswick teachings and EARM’s socio-ethical influence of walking in the light is no coincidence and must be investigated.

This situation challenges the church today. Shall it continue with this rift which has caused two factions in the church, or shall it build a paradigm based on the missio Dei to give the correct way of walking with God and thus do mission? The church has closed its eyes to this problem close to 50 years resulting in some of its members not understanding what walking in the light means. What is to be done by the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region to shape and apply a correct theology of walk in the light from the perspective of God’s mission?

Being challenged by this situation and related questions, the researcher had been motivated to do research focusing on the socio-ethical influence of walking in the light. The particular problem, therefore, is: What had been the underlying phenomenon in the Keswick theology of sanctification that could have brought about the socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in EARM in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region? The question had been, why did this split begin? What had motivated it? A paradigm shift from the current scenario to a preferred one was a key point of presentation and indigenization.

1.2.5  Main Research Question

Does the Keswick theology of sanctification contribute to the socio-ethical understanding of walking in the light in the EARM and thus influence the mission of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region?

Out of this, the following questions arose:

- What were the socio-historical circumstances that led to the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification to the EARM’s walking in the light?
- How did the current Anglican Church scholarship regard Keswick theology of sanctification and walking in the light in the EARM?
- What, if any, were the basic missiological tenets and practices that had helped shape walking in the light in EARM?
- What were the missiological foundations needed to critique specific tenets of walking in the light in EARM?
- How had Keswick theology influenced walking in the light in the Anglican Church?
- What were the significant implications of walking in the light for the present-day mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya?

1.2.5.1  Aim

This study sought to investigate the contribution of Keswick theology of sanctification to the socio-ethical understanding of walking in the light in the EARM, thus motivating the mission of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region.

1.2.5.2  Research Objectives

Therefore, the main objective of this study was to investigate the contribution of Keswick theology of sanctification to the socio-ethical understanding of walking in the light in the EARM and thus influenced the mission of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region.
This involved the following specific objectives:

- To determine the socio-historical circumstances that led to the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification to the EARM's walking in the light.
- To investigate the current Anglican Church scholarship regarding Keswick theology of sanctification and walking in the light in the EARM.
- To examine the basic missiological tenets and practices which had shaped the walking in the light framework in EARM.
- To explore the missiological foundations needed to critique specific tenets of walking in the light in EARM.
- To explore how Keswick theology had influenced walking in the light in the Anglican Church?
- To determine significant implications of walking in the light for the mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya?

1.2.6 Rationale

1.2.6.1 The four Anglican Dioceses

The rationale encompasses the reasons for choosing the four Anglican dioceses and the significance of this study. The four dioceses were selected for three reasons: first, they trace their origin from “the Diocese of Fort Hall which was created in 1961 with the Rt. Rev. Obadiah Kariuki as its first bishop. He had previously been Assistant Bishop of Mombasa and the Suffragan Bishop with special responsibility for central Kenya. The name of the Diocese was changed to Mount Kenya in December 1964” (Church of Province of Kenya, 1994:116). Second, the founder of Mount Kenya Diocese, (Kariuki, 1985:47) was an influential member of the revival movement and thus gave a good start to the growth of revival in Mount Kenya region. Third, they share the common socio-ethical phenomenon of walking in the light.

1.2.6.2 Common challenges

EARM impacts everyday challenges in the selected dioceses, such as acceptable and unacceptable moral ethics and inability to bridge the generation gap. Furthermore, the researcher has lived in Mount Kenya region and has attended worship services, and missions organized by EARM in some of the selected Anglican Dioceses.
1.2.6.3 Arise and Stand

The difference between Stand and Arise has persisted with the two factions regularly holding their conventions separately. This development suggests that while Anglican dioceses sought to consolidate mission, the two most successful strands in EARM were busy advancing seeds of discord within the revival in Mount Kenya region.

1.2.6.4 Walking in the Light

This research was necessary because, on the one hand, it illuminated the walking in the light concept of promoting mission. On the other hand, it developed a socio-ethical model for the church with reference to issues concerning EARM that could be replicated by other mainstream Protestant churches in Kenya and beyond.

1.2.7 Theoretical Framework

The study was founded on a conceptual framework consisting of main assumptions and the central theoretical argument.

1.2.7.1 Main assumptions

- Missio Dei is a multifaceted concept arising from Holy Scripture that demands close exegetical and theological analyses, as well as contextual definitions, interpretations, and applications to suit local situations and identify issues faced by EARM to advance mission in the Anglican Church successfully.

- An appropriate model would be required.

1.2.7.2 Central theoretical argument

The central theoretical argument of this work is: that Keswick teaching on the sanctification theology has been the catalyst behind the current socio-ethical concepts and practices of walking in the light that pervades EARM. The thesis further suggests a viable model that exemplifies the tenets of missio Dei, capable of practical implementation of the preferred model of walking in the light.

1.2.8 Paradigm based on the missio Dei

The study proposes an incorporative model of walking in the light that will take into account a paradigm shift from the prevailing situation to the preferred scenario. An incorporative model of walking in the light would provide a valuable base for church activities where Arise and Stand would share common perspectives of church mission. This model may initiate more dialogue.
and research on walking in the light that is localized within the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya community in particular and in the East African region in general. This will enable the community to experience the socio-ethical influence of walking in the light that is deeply rooted in the evangelical Anglican tradition and a faithful participant in the missio Dei.

1.2.9 Research Methods

1.2.9.1 Introduction

The drive of this study had been to examine the extent to which the Keswick theology of sanctification had influenced the prevailing socio-ethical behaviour demonstrated by walking in the light in EARM. This behaviour appeared to promote an exclusive spirituality while catering for the revival’s growth.

The researcher largely used qualitative research to document information from primary and secondary sources to analyze historical and empirical data of the present situation. The researcher worked out a synopsis of relevant biblical and theological resources to recommend a preferred socio-ethical scenario of walking in the light.

Since this is a contextual study, various approaches to methods of data collection were used to achieve research objectives.

1.2.9.1.1 Literature

The study of relevant literature was done to outline historical and theological perspectives of the Church mission in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. Both published and unpublished documents relevant to the study were consulted.

1.2.9.1.2 Brief Exegesis

An exegetical and theological study of selected scriptural texts that form the basis of Keswick beliefs and practices in EARM were evaluated according to the grammatico-historical method (Howard Marshall, 2003: 100-123). This was done to ascertain the Biblical author's original intended meaning in the text as a basis of engaging Keswick beliefs and practices of walking in the light in EARM. This was necessary towards ascertaining biblical perspectives in the light of missio Dei.

1.2.9.1.3 Interviews

In order to identify and explore the prevailing situation, interviews were conducted with members of EARM in the four select dioceses of Mount Kenya region. Particular attention was given to EARM leaders to get authoritative information regarding the emergence of socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light, and its subsequent impacts on a church mission. In order to identify an ideal model, findings from interviews and questionnaires were analyzed to draw appropriate conclusions.

1.2.9.2 General design of the study

Merriam (2009:50) observes that “the merits of a particular design are inherently related to the rationale for selecting it as the most appropriate plan for addressing the research problem”. On the one hand, it helps to identify data categories, and on the other, it helps to determine sources of information. It is also, pivotal to clarify to the readers the research process because as Hofstee (2006:120) notes by “explaining the research design, you provide the readers with a theoretical background to your method”. In other words, a good design informs the researcher’s choice and arrangements of research instruments that eventually lead to a reasonable conclusion (Hofstee, 2006:116).

The researcher used elective design to answer the research question adequately, what was the contribution of a Keswick theology of sanctification to the socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in the EARM as manifested in the Anglican Church today? The crux of this question underlines a socio-historical and theological context in which the current standing of the Revival is alleged to have evolved into over the years. It suffices, hypothetically, to state that, the Keswick teaching on sanctification theology had been the catalyst behind the prevailing walking in the light behaviour in EARM today. It seemed there was a phenomenon within the Revival that propelled its doctrine and thus underpinned this study. The design was structured in the light of research objectives to test the thesis statement.

Thus, the working dynamics of the following research design had been adapted, with some adjustment, from Smith (2008:212). His theological framework resonates well with concerns of this study. Furthermore, his “frame of reference comes from the South African Higher Education System” (Smith, 2008:4), and is thus authentic and contextual.

1.2.9.2.1 Chapter 1: Research Proposal

This section captures the historical overview, background and problem statement that outlines the prevailing situation. The preliminary literature is also outlined in the light of what is already known about EARM’s socio-ethical model of walking in the light. The main factions of the EARM are described alongside walking in the light model and consequently address the research gap. The chapter also discusses the main research question, rationale, theoretical framework, paradigm base and the research methods.
1.2.9.2.2 Chapter 2: Keswick theology of sanctification: socio-historical background for walking in the light.

This helped to conceptualize the term sanctification and to understand its role in the socio-ethical formation of EARM. In order to offer a critique from the perspective of Christian theology, it was found necessary to formulate a paradigm to assist sound ethical obedience involving the missio Dei.

1.2.9.2.3 Chapter 3: The Anglican Church scholarship on Keswick theology of sanctification and walking in the light model in the EARM.

Firstly, the researcher carried out a historical overview of the prevailing socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light in EARM.

Secondly, the researcher did a situational analysis to describe the current situation.

1.2.9.2.4 Chapter 4: Prevailing basic missiological tenets and practices of walking in the light.

A preferred scenario would not be possible without working on the basic missiological tenets and practices that had shaped the framework of the prevailing socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in EARM. An exegetical study of the key biblical texts was interpreted to give missiological perspectives on the prevailing situation.

The researcher had a bias towards Anglican evangelical tradition which hinged the missiological foundations needed to critique specific tenets of the prevailing model of walking in the light in EARM. This informed the researcher’s theoretical framework to analyze scriptural teachings related to sanctification and holiness to culminate in a new EARM’s model of the theology of sanctification.

1.2.9.2.5 Chapter 5: Missiological Foundations to critique specific tenets of walking in the light.

The value of the prevailing socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light could not be understated as it had nurtured the majority of Christians in East Africa. Therefore, the researcher summarized the prevailing situation as it were today using historical and empirical analyses.

Next, the researcher summarized the prevailing socio-ethical situation as it should be in the perspective of the Anglican Church mission statement in Kenya. This study also, suggests a viable biblically based model of Missio Dei.
1.2.9.2.6 Chapter 6: Conclusion

The researcher sought to conclude the study by offering practical suggestions for moving from the prevailing socio-ethical situation to the preferred mission ethics.

1.2.9.3 Why the proposed research design and methodology are appropriate to address the research aim and questions

1.2.9.3.1 Historical analytical design

The proposed research design above had been generated by the research questions and is thus appropriate to address this study. In order to discuss each objective, the researcher used various techniques to design this study. In respect to the historical nature of this study, the researcher employed historical analytical design. This design helped to get the background information of the prevailing phenomenon. However it could be a challenge to connect the past and the present, therefore interpretation was required (Hofstee, 2006:126).

In order to enhance the performance of historical events, the researcher employed survey-based research to elicit data from representatives of a larger group of people who were ready to divulge the information on people’s views, needs and attitudes (Hosftee, 2006:122). Care was taken to the type of questions to be asked, how to ask them, population sampling, representative sample and ethical concerns (Hosftee, 2006:122). This approach was necessary to track through the unfolding situation of the socio-ethical influence of walking in the light and showing what should be done to have biblical sound ethics in EARM today.

1.2.9.3.2 Methodology

Hofstee (2006:115) refers to methodology as, “The nitty-gritty of the matter” that explicates the research design, clarifying and justifying its application and informs data collection and analysis procedure “appropriate to your thesis statement.” In a nutshell, the research process should not only convince the reader but should also serve as a guide manual.

Population and sampling techniques: A non-probability sampling technique, also referred to as purposeful sampling (Merriam, 2009:77-83) was used to obtain a sample of respondents to help gather information based on EARM’s socio-ethical beliefs and practices. The target population was drawn from members of EARM in the four selected Dioceses. To choose the sample for this study the researcher adopted a criterion-based selection to “create a list of the attributes essential” for study and then “proceed to find or locate a unit matching the list” (LeCompte and Preissle, 1993:70). This criterion was important because it allowed getting responsible informants.
The population for the study was drawn from the four selected dioceses with a target population of 2500 members\textsuperscript{20} of EARM. A sample size of about 400 respondents/committed members\textsuperscript{21} sufficed to help gather information for the study. Focus groups were made of ordinary members of EARM and theological students; one-on-one in-depth interviews with EARM’s leaders and clergy, while email questionnaires were administered to bishops and prominent stakeholders of EARM. They were spread as shown below.

Data collection: The researcher conducted interviews in Kikuyu, Kiswahili, and English as was appropriate to the informants’ context. Group interviews applied to the ordinary members of EARM and to theological students (St Andrew’s College students who were members of the EARM). The one-on-one method was used to interview the District leaders of EARM and the clergy, and they were voice-recorded. The researcher sent a questionnaire via email to the Bishops of the four selected Dioceses and other stakeholders.

The investigator’ Christian upbringing that had been influenced by EARM is well informed about its concepts and practices. In order to avoid influence on the data collection procedure, \textsuperscript{20} This is according to Mr Stanley Nyaga (interview with researcher on October 23, 2013), a key member of EARM in Kirinyaga County.

\textsuperscript{21} Refers to the EARM members who attend Brethren fellowships on a regular basis.
bracketing was taken to avoid manipulating the description of the phenomenon under study. Tufford and Newman (2010:81) observe that bracketing alleviates the potentially damaging effects of unacknowledged preconceptions related to the research. It ensures that pre-understanding information will not influence the data. To enhance a thorough data collection process the voice-recording and taking notes will be pivotal.

The formatting of questions: Good questions are a recipe for good and reliable data. Merriam (2009:95) argues that “the way in which questions are worded is a crucial consideration in extracting the type of information required”. Thus, care was taken while phrasing the questions to avoid any misunderstanding. Furthermore, Merriam (2009:100) recommends a careful review of questions to remove poorly formatted ones before the start of the interview. This could call for the preliminary involvement of respondents to critique the questions and recommend those that might require modification. These questions were written to create an accurate record of the actual questions and answers.

Reliability of research instruments: Reliability refers to the extent to which research findings can be replicated, i.e. if repeated will yield the same results (Merriam, 2009:220). The test of the reliability of the instrument was done by conducting a pilot study of at least one Anglican diocese within Mount Kenya region that did not participate in the actual study. Thus, the collected data from the four select dioceses were evaluated and findings compared with this other diocese to ascertain consistency of the instrument.

The validity of the instrument: Merriam (2009:223) argues that validity concerns the extent to which the findings of one study can be applied to other situations, i.e., how generalizable are the results of a research study? The interview tool, as well as the answers, were scientifically evaluated by experts in the field to ensure that the questions put to the respondents would gather the required data to respond to the research objectives.

Data collection instruments/techniques: The researcher used interviews and documents analyses techniques to collect the relevant data for this study.

1. Interview: Interviews were the primary method of gathering information because it is the commonest way of eliciting data in qualitative research. DeMarrais (2004:55) expresses interview as a conversation between a researcher and informant on questions related to the research study. Merriam (2009:88) adds that interview is essential when one cannot observe behaviour, feelings, or how people interpret a phenomenon. This helped to gather data on the present reality of the situation.

22 Interview instruments will be scientific
The researcher required five research assistants from every county in the selected Dioceses to help with research planning process prior, during and after the interviews. They comprised, but not exclusively, former students at St Andrew’s College of Theology, Kabare, Kenya. The main selection criterion was the membership of EARM, and non-probability sampling technique was used as exemplified above. To ensure quality, the researcher brought all the twenty research assistants (Annexure 2) together for a one-day seminar at St Andrew’s College of Theology, Kabare, Kenya before the start of the interviews. The proposed guest speaker was Prof. John Ndg’u Ikenye (Annexure 3), the head of Pastoral Theology and Social Sciences Department at St Paul’s University, Limuru, Kenya. The topics to be covered were guided by the Northwest University ethical code. Other items included among others, selection and registration criteria of the informants, classification, coding of the data, and establishing a rapport.

The following interview designs applied to focus group, one-on-one, and e-mail.

- Focus groups interview design

Merriam (2009:93) defines a focus group interview as “an interview on a topic with a group of people who have knowledge of the topic”. This design suits this study because groups of EARM’s ordinary members and theological students (Annexures 4 and 5), respectively were interviewed. This method is unique says Chandran (2004:106) “because it is less structured, more informal and interactive…” The discussion questions were administered at different times in the selected counties. This design was semi-structured to allow a mix of informal questions and formal ones, and thus friendly to all respondents.

Interviews took place at local centres of worship across the four counties. Since it was not possible to visit every centre due to logistic challenges, the researcher randomly selected about twenty centres, at least five from each county. The face-to-face method of interviewing was paramount. Since this study focused on the current situation, the research on Keswick theology was done within the Kenyan context.

The focus group discussion comprised the ordinary members, comprising five focus groups of 10-15 members per county, i.e., 50 – 75 members per county. Theological students formed one focus group of 10-15 members at St Andrew’s College, Kabare. The following proposed questionnaire applied to the above respondents, respectively.

- One-on-one in-depth interview guide

23 Members of EARM.
24 All questions are either flexibly worded or a mix of more or less structured questions.
25 Interviews will include a scientifically approved questionnaire.
The EARM leadership (Annexure 4) and the clergy26 (Annexure 5) were interviewed by 5-10 members respectively, per county. That means the total respondents on a one-on-one in-depth interview in the four counties ranged from 40 – 80. The population sampling and data collection techniques used to describe focus group design applied. One-on-one interview or what is referred to by Merriam as the person-to-person encounter is the commonest type of interview “in which one person elicits information from another” (2009:88). It appeared to be the best tool to extract confidential information from a respondent though it may lack interrogation from other informants (focus groups) and thus can lead to questions about its objectivity and reliability. However, the research instruments were evaluated in the light of data findings from informants who did not participate in the actual research.

The researcher voice-recorded information in the course of the interview, so as not to miss facts that might be substantial. As a non-participatory observer, the researcher also wrote observers comments to capture non-verbal reactions. Research Assistants were necessary here to standardize the recording process.

- Interview design for Bishops and other prominent stakeholders (Annexure 5).

This technique applied to either one-on-one or email interviews. Therefore, 5 -10 prominent stakeholders were randomly selected to inform areas that might be unclear from the existing written literature. Other respondents were the four bishops of the selected Dioceses.

Firstly, the researcher needed an introduction to establish rapport; indicating what study he was undertaking, the purpose of the interview and an ethical declaration. Secondly, the respondents’ identities were to be protected, and in the case of disclosure, they were to permit it in writing. Thirdly, the researcher explained why the respondents’ information was significant in this study.

2. Documents: This is the second technique that was used in this study. Merriam (2009:139) uses the term document, “as an umbrella to refer to a wide range of written, visual, digital, and physical material relevant to the study at hand”. The explanation of the term ‘document’ seems to go beyond secondary research and in essence shares in primary research. Primary sources, observes Merriam (2009:152), “are those in which the originator of the document is recounting the first-hand experience with the phenomenon of interest. The best primary sources are those recorded closest in time and place to the phenomenon by a qualified person”.

This technique, therefore, used to take care of a distant past where individuals with knowledge may not be alive. In other perspectives, an indirect method of data collection seems to replace the term document as expressed by Chandran (2004:109), “Indirect sources of data include hear-say narratives, written documents, and books. Historical research, for example, relies heavily on indirect sources of information such as individuals who have heard of history or events, records of events, activities in the form of hand-written notes, minutes and books."

Documents, with this understanding, helped answer research questions concerning the emergence of the current socio-ethical lifestyle. It was best suited to interpret how the situation emerged and also set the pace to explain the preferred scenario.

The main limitations of this technique as outlined by Merriam (2009:153-154) were:

a) Documents are not produced for research purposes, the information they offer may not be in a form that is useful to the investigator.

b) Documents are difficult to determine their authenticity and accuracy.

No doubt this technique required skillful approach. Merriam (2009:150) rightly notes, “Since the investigator is the primary instrument for gathering data, he or she relies on skills and intuition to find and interpret data from documents.” The researcher visited the Kenya National Archives and the Anglican Church of Kenya Archives in Nairobi. Also, learning institutional libraries in Kenya like St Andrew’s College of Theology, Kabare and St Paul’s University, Limuru were consulted. In South Africa, George Whitefield College (Cape Town), Stellenbosch University and Northwest University (Potchefstroom) were a central source of library data.

1.2.9.4 Limitations

The study was done in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. If the researcher was to expand the scope, the study would become too wide for proper research. According to documented records, the first revival convention was held at Kahuhia27 in 1947 (Mambo, 1973:113). In order to capture EARM background, the study ranged from 1930 to 2015. The concentration was in the Anglican dioceses in the selected counties. It might be easy to generalize data findings to other Anglican Dioceses influenced by the revival in Kenya and beyond. However, it might be a challenge to other churches influenced by the revival such as the Methodist Churches of Kenya and the Presbyterian Church of East Africa because of denominational differences. So, the researcher does not expect to make a definitive conclusion but offer a suggestive viable model.

The success of the data collecting instruments depended largely on the rapport the researcher developed with the respondents. Sometimes he relied on his Research Assistants who were expected to be in a fellowship with the informants for efficient gathering of information.

27 Kahuhia is a place in the Diocese of Mt Kenya Central in Mount Kenya region.
1.2.9.5 Ethical considerations

Identification of research respondents across the two dominant factions in the EARM was a challenge. The researcher avoided asking probing questions that might reveal their identity. Their identity was, therefore, stored in coded files to prevent potential risk to the research participants (Hofstee, 2006:118). Meriam (2009:230) further argues that the informants have right to “the protection from harm, the right to privacy, the notion of informed consent and the issue of deception all need to be considered ahead of time”. The Northwest University manual for postgraduate students (2010:61) has described the vulnerable groups and the potential risk areas (see footnotes 7 and 8). The researcher needed strategies put in place to ascertain that appropriate practices and safeguards were rigorously implemented. Arise and Stand are small communities, who know each other, and the members are in various power relations with each other, and the research involves questions about conflict; this is important to protect human subjects from harm.

As indicated earlier, the objective of this study was not to draw a comparison between Arise and Stand as this could lead to stigma and potential harm to the respondents. The gist of this work, therefore, was the understanding by the EARM of the socio-ethical concepts and practices of walking in the light. There were no questions specifically meant for any of the factions. Furthermore, they were to give informed consent (Annexure 6) whether to be interviewed in one group or separately. The experts checked the efficacy of the questionnaires as an appropriate tool for this study before the commencement of the survey. The ethical research code was enforced through an ethics committee of NWU (Annexure 7) and the oversight of the researcher’s NWU supervisor.

As a member of Anglican Church of Kenya mostly modeled by EARM, the researcher was aware of moral boundaries and ethical practices, which he had to respect. This study took place within church-based institutions and required consent letters (Annexure 8) from church ministers to allow their parishioners to attend the interviews. Informed consent by members of EARM was seminal as Research Assistants had to register informants voluntarily in their local churches.

1.3 CONCLUSION

The researcher has shown how Keswick theology of sanctification might have influenced the prevailing situation of EARM in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region, promoting an exclusive socio-ethical belief and practice of walking in the light while catering for the revival’s growth. The researcher has also shown how qualitative research could be used to document information from primary and secondary sources to analyze historical and empirical data of the present situation and to work out a synopsis of relevant biblical and theological resources to recommend a preferred scenario. This study has also shown the unfolding gap in the existing literature that this study sought to fill. Despite the growing interest in the 21st-century theological representation, no theologian has yet seriously examined the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification on EARM socio-ethical representation of walking in the light in the context of missio Dei in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. This hinged on the thesis statement that Keswick teaching on the sanctification theology had been the catalyst behind the prevailing socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in EARM. Thus, the following chapter sought to explore socio-historical context that could have attracted Keswick teachings in East Africa.

2.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter discusses the socio-historical circumstances that led to the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification in the EARM’s walking in the light. In order to answer the question that guides this chapter, a five-fold approach will be used. The first introduces the chapter as a whole; the second defines walking in the light, and since this is a mission study it is placed in the context of missio Dei, when the socio-historical context of East Africa is described; the third gives a historical view of Keswick Theology; the fourth explores the affinity between the sociological circumstances and the Keswick theology; the fifth evaluates EARM against missio Dei and the sixth concludes the chapter. This will position the EARM’s socio-historical concept and practice of walking in the light in its proper context.

2.2 WALKING IN THE LIGHT

Just before working on the theme of this section, an explanation of the relationship between the Anglican Church and the EARM will be necessary. Though initially, EARM had infiltrated the Anglican Church in East Africa in the early 20th century, it nevertheless later was attracted to other mission churches like Methodist and Presbyterian. The movement brought together a significant number of adherents from the churches mentioned above. The fact that this study investigates the EARM in the Anglican Church justifies its relationship as that of a daughter and a mother, respectively. Thus, the term EARM is not a synonym with either Anglican Church or any other, but a movement that cuts across the Protestant mission churches.

Following this, a contextual definition and description of walking in the light is necessary before situating it in the missio Dei. In order to place walking in the light into a manageable socio-historical context, the focus narrows mainly to Kenya, which is one of the East Africa countries\(^{28}\) adversely influenced by the EARM.

2.2.1 Contextual Definition

The phrase walking in the light as used by the members of EARM refers to a daily sanctification which is attained by a life of daily walk with the Lord and a regular examination of one’s heart and repentance (Gitari, n.d:2). Ward & Wild-Wood (2012:215) seem to concur with Gitari in their statement that walking in the light means being transparent and open with one another. In spite of its somewhat erroneous theological background, walking in the light has had a profound influence on EARM’s socio-ethical belief and practice. To grasp the strength of this force something more elaborate and descriptive than a definition would be required.

\(^{28}\) The countries that comprise East Africa are Sudan, South Sudan, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Seychelles, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Rwanda and Burundi. Among these, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Rwanda and Burundi are the main attraction of EARM because of their historical contact with the Keswick movement.

2.2.2 Contextual Description

Bruner (2012:256) gives one of the most profound descriptions of the phrase walking in the light from the perspective of the EARM: “the Balokole29 believed that spiritual darkness shrouded sinful secrets, and they worked to bring these secrets to the light. They believed that sins must be exposed through public confession, and revivalists developed a lifestyle of making public those sins. They called this way of life ‘walking in the light’ (okutambulira mu musana).” Gitari (n.d:2) asserts that Brethren will know that one is living a sanctified life when one attends fellowship meetings regularly, testifies about his trials and temptations, and walks in the light. The weekly fellowship meeting gives each person an opportunity to share with the Brethren the kind of life he has lived since the last fellowship meeting. Since they consider the devil to be always at war with the believers, the testimony must include a statement of the temptations one has gone through and the way he has turned to Jesus for victory. This, in a nutshell, is what it means to walk in the light from the Brethren’s point of view. If one’s lifestyle is to the contrary, one may be declared as no longer saved. Furthermore, Brethren who have nothing to say during a fellowship meeting may cause concern and might even be declared lukewarm or spiritually cold.

As a result, public testimony and confession have become the most enduring EARM’s phenomenon that achieves walking in the light, albeit sometimes contentious and confrontational. It is contentious because of a tendency to confess past misdeeds that might breed serious relational consequences with the aggrieved member of the community who hitherto had no information of betrayal until then. It could also prove confrontational. For instance, the Principal of Crowther Hall, Birmingham, completely unaware of the revival practice, was accosted by an English lady back from Uganda. She asked whether she could be in the light with him, i.e., allow her to point out one or two of his shortcomings, after which he was fully reinstated to fellowship with her (Barrington-Ward, 2012:54). In spite of the fact that this practice of public confession is dying as noted by Karanja (2012:146), it is still one of the most cherished ways to explicate the principle of a daily walk in the light.

Indeed, walking in the light has become the catchphrase within the members of EARM. For example, in Kenya, they are variously referred in Kiswahili language as watu wa nuru (people of 29 Refer to the saved ones in Luganda language and is synonymous to the Brethren, a term widely used in Kenya to insinuate members of EARM.
the light). In fact, a slot has always been given during weekly revival fellowships for members to shed light. That is to confess to one another the sins of the previous week. The phrase has also been used within EARM as a way of enlightening each other about the coming events. However, the formal statement is what mostly describes the Brethren concerning the practice of a daily walk with the Lord, i.e., a life of daily sanctification. Such a life, in the eyes of Brethren, invariably describes a saved person.

Hooper (2007:87) states that EARM expects a saved person to daily yield to the Holy Spirit and Christ by faith. This habit of yielding or brokenness in the daily walk with God, in the power of Jesus’ cleansing blood and the mediation of the Holy Spirit influences an abiding attitude of prayer and crying to God (Hooper, 2007:88) ‘Abba, Father’, in what looks like a real communion with God (Rom. 8: 15f.).

Further, Senyonyi (2013:8) states that the revivalists have dire need to unmask anything that could prejudice their freedom to share their walk with God. They believe that if they walk in the light as He is in the light, Jesus Christ’s blood will cleanse them from all sin (1John 1:7). Indeed, Kariuki (1985:52, 53), one of the early Anglican bishops in Kenya, recalls his interaction with Nisibambi that led to his understanding of Christ as his personal light and saviour. Indeed, personal light arose out of the belief that the revival works in an individual before it could work in the Brethren fellowship. In consultation with the church, these fellowships sometimes become particularly significant in planning and executing Brethren’s mission among other agenda. The extent to which walking in the light has been buttressed in the mission of God might require unpacking.

2.2.3.1 Description of missio Dei

The concept of missio Dei underpins all the socio-ethical teachings of the Bible as far as EARM’s mission of walking in the light is concerned. Wright (2006:357) argues that the ethical challenge to God’s people is two-fold. On the one hand, it is to recognize the mission of God as the heartbeat of their very existence and on the other, is to respond in ways that express and facilitate it rather than deny and hinder it. Wright, (2006:358) further notes that the Bible’s grand narrative is about the mission of God and demands appropriate ethical response dimensions from humanity. Abraham (Gen, 22:16-18) serves as a model for the continuing education of his descendants who must walk in the way of the Lord in righteousness and justice so that God can accomplish the missional purpose of Abraham’s election (Wright, 2006:358). This is well articulated in Genesis 18:18-19 which expresses a moral agenda for the nations on earth.
Wright (2006:359) singles out Sodom as a model of the fallen world and demonstrates God’s response (judgment) on evil doers, those who negate the way of the Lord. Abraham is posited as a model of God’s mission albeit in a context of the wickedness of Sodom (Wright, 2006:360). Wright (2006:363) examines the ethical content of the phrases ‘the way of the Lord’ and ‘doing righteousness and justice’. These two protracted phrases anchor ethical expressions in this section as per the teachings and expectations of the Israelites in relation to Yahweh. They will also provide insight into understanding the principal theme, walking in the light in the EARM.

On the one hand, the expression keeping the way of the Lord or walking in the way of the Lord Wright (2006:363) argues, was a metaphor used in the Old Testament to contrast with the ways of other gods or the way of sinners – in this particular case, the way of Yahweh and the way of Sodom. Wright (2006:364,365) notes that the expression walking in the way of the Lord is mostly used to construe obeying God’s command as to reflect God in human life. That is, doing for your neighbour what God has done for you.

On the other hand, the expression righteousness and justice speaks of conformity to what is right or expected, rightly expressed as social justice, actual things that you do (Wright, 2006:365,367). This missional ethics concept could further be explicated in two ways. Firstly, mission as an instrument to dispense release to the oppressed. This understanding arises from the belief that the way of the Lord is to do righteousness and justice for the oppressed, and is against the oppressor. While expressing the importance of ethics in God’s mission to bless the nations, Wright (2006:368) contends that ethics sandwich election and mission. This portrays the missional logic of Genesis 18:19 as effected through Abraham’s election that was anticipated to bring out a community’s dedicated to the ethical reflection of God’s character. Secondly, Wright (2006:369) asserts that God’s aim to dispense blessings to the nations is tied to God’s ethical demand on the people he has created to be the agent of that blessing. This moral imperative has practical dimensions explicated by missional ethics of practical holiness because “being holy meant living lives of integrity, justice, and compassion in every area of life” (Wright, 2006: 373).

2.2.3.2 Walking in the light within a mission of God’s framework

Since the people of God are called to be a light to the nations, they ought to walk in the light in transformed lives of a holy people. Thus, the problem that is attended to in this context is that walking in the light has led to categorizing one group of Christians as saved while the other is not. This has hampered the mission of the church. The Brethren appears to focus more on the outward conformity exemplified by socio-ethical beliefs and practices than inward conformity achieved through the power of the Holy Spirit. But a concept of walking in the light is needed that operates within a comprehensive mission framework, which helps the church participate fully in the missio Dei. Indeed, Daugherty (2007:165) argues that if the church’s mission is to extend the missio Dei, then it can be nothing short of continuing that embodiment of God in Christ among the people of the world.

However, the missio Dei concept is not primarily an activity of the church, but an attribute of a missionary God. Therefore, it is not the church that has a mission but the Triune God. Thus, the concept of walking in the light raises a critical question about its place in the Trinitarian God. This is because Brethren seem to emphasize the centrality of the cross [Christ] while other members of the Trinity are relegated to the peripheries. This anomaly shall be discussed during evaluation of EARM against missio Dei later in this chapter. Aagaard (1973:13) observes that mission ought to be seen as a movement from God to the world, and the church should be viewed as an instrument for that mission. Certainly, there was no better way for God to exemplify His love for humanity except through the glorious incarnation of His Son and our Saviour, Jesus Christ. Hence, as partakers of mission in God, Christians are bound to walk in His holiness [in His light].

Since the Bible is about the mission (Wright, 2006:29) then walking with God is in itself walking in the mission of God. Thus, the Biblical concept of walking in the light is without a doubt synonymous with walking with God. This idea is postulated in in both Testaments. Whereas Gen.5:24; 6:9 indicate Enoch and Noah had a righteous walk with God, 2 Peter 3:9 shows that believers are to walk in the light of the Lord’s return, given the judgment that is coming on the world. So, the Genesis texts are indicative of the status of the walk which is in Spirit and perfect. This suggests that God’s mission is a way of life of the people of God. Also, Peter’s Epistle text brings to the fore the imperative aspect of God’s expectations towards humanity with regard to His mission. The declarations seem to indicate a calling of people of God to a particular vocation whose characteristics demand righteous disposition towards God and His mission. This confirms that God has not left His Great Commission at the mercy of humanity as He swore to build his missioner church (Matt. 16:18) (Piper, 2010:75). The mission is, therefore, as Bosch (1991:390) observes a movement from God to the World and the Church a vessel for that mission.

In addition, Wright (2006:22-23) argues that if mission should be biblically informed and authenticated, then it should underpin the church’s committed participation as God’s people, at God’s invitation and command, in God’s own mission within the history of God’s world for the redemption of God’s creation. Therefore, God is the owner of the mission while the Church is a participant upon invitation and command of God. Moreover, the fact that Wright (2006:23) mentions the purpose of God’s mission as redemption of God’s creation fits well with John Piper’s (2010:206) conception of the missionary text in John 10:16, that affirms God’s missionary purpose of gathering His sheep, or building His Church (Matt.16:18) from all the nations. This resonates with Bosch’s (1991:390) argument that the church is an instrument of God’s love in the world because He is a fountain of sending love. If this is the case, the church (through which EARM’s operates) ought to champion practical holiness by positioning walking in the light into its right perspective in the mission of God. This positioning may be an exercise in futility when not placed in the socio-historical context.

2.2.4 Socio-historical context of Kenya

As mentioned earlier, East Africa comprises ten countries, but among these only Rwanda, Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya could be said to have experienced the profound influence of EARM since its origin at Gahini, Rwanda in 1929 (Ward, 2012:3). The four countries provide a sufficient socio-historical background for EARM’s beliefs and practices for walking in the light. In order to answer the research question exhaustively the focus has been narrowed onto Kenya, the home country of the researcher, where the movement entered in 1938 (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:198). The other three countries will prove useful for other critical and backup information. This is because the analogous socio-historical context of walking in the light has been found across the East African region, especially in the aforesaid nations. It is important therefore to establish the daily life circumstances and experiences that led to its acceptance particularly by the ordinary people. These circumstances and experiences were informed by both external and internal influences.

2.2.4.1 External influences

The external influences, in this context, will refer to a situation that was inspired by events or forces from outside or beyond the powers of the East African people. We shall consider racial segregation, epidemics and diseases as the major threats that could have influenced Africans’ livelihood at the beginning of the 20th century.

2.2.4.1.1 Racial segregation

In 1905, the white settlers in Kenya, following the example of South Africa made the British government enact racial laws to control and subjugate Africans. According to these laws, not only were African native reserves created but also the establishment of the Masters and Servants Ordinance, poll tax and pass system (Muita, 2003:4). This denied Africans their tribal land and reduced them to servanthood under strict labour policies. Indeed, Odhiambo (1977:157) notes that the European demarcation of the Kenyan land was at best racist with the best land going to the Europeans, the so-called white highlands. Furthermore, Odhiambo 30 Since the researcher was born and raised in Kenya it was found prudent to situate the study in the Kenyan context. Again, although he is not a member of EARM, he came to faith through the ministries of the Brethren in Kenya.

(1977:157) argues that the 1915 Crown Lands Ordinance made the Reserves Crown land and the Africans tenants could be evicted any time.

This led to Africans feeling insecure in their own country for they were subdued and subjected not only to harsh means of earning money but to poll tax, as well (Odhiambo, 1977:156). More hardship and suffering were in the offing when in 1919 the new governor, General Northey issued a circular to increase the labour force (Odhiambo, 1977:156). This circular subjected Africans males over sixteen years of age to carry a kipande\(^{31}\). It was illegal to be found without it. In principle, the kipande became a badge of servitude. These abuses aroused national feelings culminating in social unrest. Harry Thuku who received mission education became secretary of the Young Kikuyu Association, a mouthpiece for African grievances. In 1922, he was arrested leading to a bloody violence in Nairobi that left many Kenyans dead (Sagay & Wilson, 1978:369). This signaled the beginning of a concerted pressure by Africans for complete independence from the white-dominated rule.

Africans felt let down even by missionaries who meticulously worked alongside the colonial officials such that there was little point in distinguishing one set of white people from another (Walls, 2002:103). This observation sounds bells to a saying by the Gikuyu people of Kenya during the colonial era, gutiri Muthungu na Mubia (there is no difference between a priest and a colonial administrator). As Gatimu (2008:30) observes many Church Missionary Society (CMS) missionaries of this period assumed that their nationality was a crucial issue for them; but ironically, this negative appraisal of their status proved more significant culminating to Africans’ conclusion that European domination was equivalent to the spreading of the Gospel. Indeed, the CMS had to follow secularizing drifts, despite reservations that these might betray the principles associated with the previous years of heroic evangelism (Beidelman, 1982:72) that as Walls (2002:98) notes, never regarded Africans as children.

Thus, both the European settlers and missionaries seemed to approach Africans from a racist point of view, where Africans’ interests were considered inferior to that of the white people. This being the case Africans might have felt betrayed and could have sought for ways to make their grievances heard primarily through the political outlet. The formation of a militant group led by Harry Thuku in 1922 was a high point of defiance against racism (Odhiambo., 1977:155) and inspired the Africans to protest openly [walking in the light] against colonialism in Kenya. Thus, entry of Keswick theology in East Africa could have found adherents who had already experienced segregation. It was not difficult therefore to accommodate Keswick teachings of two sets of people, the saved and the surrendered Christians. This led to the beginning of the abaka, “those on fire, from the verb kwaka, to set light to” (Church, 1981:100). This describes the wave of evangelistic zeal by those who were getting saved leading to moral transformation exemplified by the changed life of being in the light with one another. This resulted in the formation of Brethren, those who walk in light and shares testimony with one another. Thus, Brethren became a set of Christians in Kenya whose teachings set themselves apart from other Christians. Indeed, they exemplify a lifestyle pattern, akin to what could be regarded as socio-ethical racism. Let’s now turn to the other continuum of circumstances beyond Africans’ control.

2.2.4.1.2 Epidemics and Diseases

At the beginning of 20th century, the Gikuyu of Kenya were frequented with diseases and famines such that these maladies were sometimes used to compute years or events Wambugu, et al. (2006:139, 210-14). Also, the year of the famine of 1917, argues Wambugu, et al. (2006:211) came to be called famine of Kimotho (Gikuyu name for left-handed, his real name was Lawford) who was the District Commissioner of Fort-Hall, Murang’a today. This naming proves the intensity of the occurrences and the impacts left in its wake.

The phenomena were widespread even outside borders of Kenya. For instance, Guillebaud (1959:35) records the intensity of the dreaded leprosy in Uganda and Rwanda, such that the first missionaries’ doctors had to secure a special block at Kabale Hospital for leprosy sufferers. The problem of this scourge was underlined by the proposal to build a Leprosy Hospital at Kabale, Uganda in 1928. This is not to suggest leprosy was the only challenge facing the East African countries, other diseases were common too. Church (1981:35-36) in his Rwanda notes, recorded a unique malady:

“Now a word about yaws – this extraordinary disease hardly ever heard in Europe. It is somewhat like syphilis, but not spread in the same way; incurable, chronic, crippling, often ending in limb contractions and blindness, and even babies in arms came covered all over their bodies with the secondary infections stage and swarming with flies. But by the mercy of God… a rapid and dramatic cure [was found] called Sobita, a water-soluble white powder of sodium bismuth tartrate... We reckoned that about 90% of the people were or had been infected by yaws in Eastern Ruanda.... [The] injections hurt, but the more they hurt the more the people liked them, and the name of the hospital went far and wide.”

Yaws, among other skin diseases, was also common in the Gikuyu land as observed by Wambugu et al. (2006:140):
“Very few of the Agikuyu escaped the disease called yaws (muchari)32. This was usually contracted in childhood. After an incubation of from twelve to twenty days, the prodromic period begins, and the skin loses its brightness and becomes pale and discoloured. The patient feels indisposed, general relaxation sets in with pain at the lumbar region and at the joints, cephalgia, gastric troubles, and fever. After some time there appears a cutaneous eruption, itching and painful at pressure. In less than one week the eruption becomes vascular and suppurates. Within about three weeks it is fully developed, and secondary groups appear elsewhere on the body. At this stage, fever disappears.”

In 1919 the Gikuyu land of Kenya was devastated by a plague that killed tens of thousands. Kariuki (1985:22) underlines the intensity of this plague by the fact that his rika (age-set) came to be called *Rika ria kimiiir*33 (the age-mate of the slayer).

Another unusual incident worth mentioning was the entry into Ruanda notes by Bert Jackson in August 1928 of a sickly baby receiving treatment. He wrote:

“I was walking across the country a few days ago when the cry of child faintly caught my ear. As I drew nearer the cry developed into one never-ending howl which I think I shall never forget. I found a poor little chap about five or six years old just covered with sores from head to foot so that he could neither lie, sit nor stand without pressing on some of them, and surrounded by a cloud of flies. A fond parent was in the process of picking off old mud from the sores and putting on fresh. This is the native idea of a healing dressing. It certainly does prevent the flies from eating the child alive and also hinders the spread of infection, but imagine what a comfortable dressing sunbaked mud makes on raw flesh! Now with an injection, all these sores soon heal up and a child takes an interest in life once more (Church, 1981:36).”

Such were the circumstances and experiences meted against East Africans by diseases they could hardly handle except sometimes through outside help. The coming of Europeans with conventional medicine that could do wonders in comparison with traditional alternatives must have led Africans to change side from traditional and cultural ways of treatment to the modern medicine. No wonder, Guillebaud (1959:35) notes that some of the first people to respond to the Gospel messages were leprosy patients at Kabale. Given this background of maladies, it could not have been difficult for Africans to see the light in the missionaries’ method of dealing with diseases. This trust in the missionary ways of curing most of the physical ailments (Church, 1981:35) could have influenced Africans to accept salvific messages. Consequently, many Africans left behind ways of darkness to the modes of light.

Surely, a recap of discussion on external influences at the dawn of the Keswick theology in East Africa shows that, while racism brought to the fore preferential treatment of one person against the other, diseases and epidemics appeared to bring the races together. However, in both ways, a need to embrace a new way of life [a new light] was remarkably evident. They needed to move away from dehumanizing forces that seemed to oppress and maim, to freedom and well-being. Since Africans lived in communities, this turnaround could not be hidden. Let’s now turn to the internal influences.

2.2.4.2 Internal influences

The other spectrum of influences was motivated by Africans themselves as a way to safeguard their culture and posterity. These are internal forces and include public confession, African sacrifice, rites of passage, age-sets marriage, and communal life. Each item is discussed in turn showing how their unique nature could have reinforced a need to walk in the light.

2.2.4.2.1 Public confession

Karanja (2012:147) observes that confession played a significant role in the African religion and culture. It was used among the Gikuyu to drive away effects of ritual defilement/taboo (thahu) to achieve healing. A symbolic vomiting (gutahikio) was done by a traditional healer to treat supernatural illnesses. A case in point is Kenyatta’s (1965:281-82) description of a healing ritual where the sick person is led to confess all evils.

“Before the magician proceeds with his actual work of healing, the sick man who is about to be treated is asked to spit on the healing magic or to lick it. In this way, a direct communication with the ancestral spirits is established through the medium of the magician. At this juncture, the magician starts to chant the healing ritual with a strong voice and unusual tone and rhythm, accompanied by the tinkling of the rugambi34. At the same time, he swings the magical horn over the head of his patient. Suddenly, in a mystical state of mind, he stops chanting and, looking the sick man straight in the face, he addresses a few words of a magical formula to him, saying:

“Sick man, I have come to chase away your illness. I will also chase away the evil spirits which have brought it. Confess the evils which you know, and also those you do not know. Prepare yourself, for you are about to vomit all these evils’.

34 This is a small hand bell which is part and parcel of the healing magic. It is easily recognized by its peculiar sound, which is believed to have the power of frightening the evil spirits.
“The magician had dug a round hole in the ground into which he poured some water. At this point he dipped what was believed to be healing magic into the water to induce the evil spirits to come out. The sick man kneels, facing the water as if he was vomiting while the magician squats on the other end facing the sick man. The magician recites the following spell:

This (pointing to the healing magic) is a root. I root out the evils which are in your body.

This is clearing away. I clear away the evils which are in your body.

This is a weakening. I weaken the evil spirits which are in your body.

This is a calming. I calm the illness which is in your body.

“After each sentence, the sick man licked the githitu (the healer’s magical charm) and spat in the water. He pretended to vomit saying: “I vomit the illness and the evil spirits that are in my body” (Kenyatta, 1965:283). By the act of symbolic vomiting, the sick person was assured that he had received total healing and thus calming his psychological anxiety.”

This vomiting gesture meant that the victim was now set free to walk and mingle with people as a clean person, a fact that was acclaimed and certified by the medicine man. It appears like the sick man was now declared righteous, no longer guilty of the charges that had been directed against him hitherto. Therefore, public confession of sin as was taught by Keswick movement could have found in the East African setting of vomiting of the evil spirits familiar ground. Hence, the need to walk in the light could have made sense as a way to achieve a not guilty verdict/ not guilty of sin. Indeed, sometimes propitiation was done by performing a sacrifice to redeem the victim.

2.2.4.2.2 Ritual sacrifice

Wambugu et al. (2006:190,191) state that a sacrifice was more of a public worship that would require a sacrifice of a goat by a medicine man to appease the spirits or avert a taboo. Some Gikuyu people either sprinkled blood while others sprinkled tatha35 as exemplified by Wambugu et al. (2006:192):

“[Firstly] Anyone who touched a corpse or was bereaved, he contracted a special impurity called Gikuu (death). If such a person drank cow’s milk or passed through cattle’s herd, all the cattle became unclean. A medicine man had to be called to slaughter and sprinkle the herd with its tatha.

35 The contents of the stomach and intestines of the animal.
“[Secondly] If anyone was heard to whisper in the night near the hut, or a stick fell on the thatch or struck against the wall, it was believed it was poisoned by the enemy. A goat had to be slaughtered the next day. Enough sprinkling of blood was to be done in the direction where whispering was heard or where the sound of the stick was heard.”

The list of incidences that warranted sacrifice is endless, and Wambugu et al. (2006:191-194) could only manage to record twenty-seven cases. This shows that circumstances that led to the slaughter of an animal were frequent. The fear of the evil spirit was an ever-present phenomenon in the people’s mind. The shedding of blood -to appease the spirit- was a significant gesture that assured the victim and the community of salvation from evil. Similarly, the shedding of Christ’s blood on the cross to save humanity from the sin principle was one of the fundamental teachings of Keswick theology. Thus, the Keswick teachings could have found bearing in the East African circumstances of the shedding of sacrificial blood to appease the spirits. Again, these sacrifices were made in public, declaring salvation of the evil spirits. The victim could now walk in the light or publicly acknowledging salvation from evil/taboo. He or she was welcomed back to the full participation in the affairs of the communal life.

2.2.4.2.3 Communal life

Kunhiyop (2008:20) observes that we and us concept is deeply rooted in Africans from childhood. Mbiti’s exposition of the concept of community, cited in Kunhiyop (2008:21) is sensational:

“In traditional life, the individual does not and cannot exist alone except corporately. He owes his existence to other people, including those of past generations and his contemporaries. He is simply part of the whole. The community must, therefore, make, create or produce the individual; for the individual depends on the corporate group…. Only in terms of other people does the individual become conscious of his own being, his own duties, his privileges and responsibilities towards himself and towards other people. When he suffers, he does not suffer alone but with the corporate group; when he rejoices, he rejoices not alone but with his kinsmen, his neighbours and his relatives whether living or dead. When he gets married he is not alone, neither does the wife “belong” to him alone. So, also the children belong to the corporate body of kinsmen, even if they bear only their father’s name. Whatever happens to the individual happens to the whole group, and whatever happens to the whole group happens to the individual. Therefore the individual can only say, “I am because we are, and since we are, therefore, I am.”

Hence the Gikuyu saying: kamuungi koyaga ndiri[^36], which means corporate activities, makes massive works easier. This fits well with relationships and community values. As Kenyatta (1965:113) contends “an old man who has no children of his own is helped by his neighbour’s children… his hut is built, his garden dug, firewood is cut and water is fetched for him.” This justifies another Gikuyu proverb, rui runenehagio in tuthima (a river is enlarged by its tributaries) and demonstrates the importance of the individual. At the same time the person must not forget that he is an individual among others, and so must consider the rights of other people. So the daily expectations for human beings have been to live as an individual and as a community.

This is better illustrated through the age-set system. A Gikuyu proverb Nyumba na riika itiumanagwo (a family/clan and an age group are inseparable) could be a case in point. The proverb cautions an individual that he cannot be separated from his clan and age group no matter what the individual may have done. The need to stay in tune within the community norms could thus not be stressed. It may not have been a big surprise, therefore, that the seed of the Keswick beliefs and practices, which displayed community set up, found fertile ground in East Africa.

To be a full member of the community with rights and privileges, one had to pass through a rite of passage, as applicable in different African cultural systems. Rites of passage form an important community group dynamics that include the age-set system referred to above. These dynamics could have created the necessary facets for Keswick theology which also prided in community undercurrents.

2.2.4.2.4 Rites of passage

A rite of passage is one single circumstance that more than any other favoured Keswick spirituality in East Africa. It was performed on special occasions to indicate entry into a new stage of life like birth, puberty, marriage, and death. When any of these rituals took place, it did not only attract the immediate family but the surrounding community. Puberty and marriages rites dynamics are community centered and therefore seem to offer suitable socio-historical circumstances that could have favoured Keswick theology in East Africa. Let’s start with puberty rites.

Puberty rituals have been practiced for centuries on young men and women across Africa and beyond. In Kenya, circumcision is common except among the Luo and Turkana societies. In the past, it was usually performed in a public ceremony.

[^36]: Ndiri is a heavy wooden mortar and requires many people to lift it
The significance of it being held publicly had implications to the initiate and community. Firstly, as Magesa (1997:101) observes, the initiation confirmed the initiate's connection with the ancestors through formal induction into the ethnic group. It was a mark of unity with the people. Secondly, it was intended to instill courage. Magesa (1997:09) argues, “Without courage among the youth, the life-force of the clan withers and will eventually die. For if the young men of the community are cowards, who will then defend the people? Similarly, will there be live births if the mothers-to-be cannot bear pain, namely, the pain of childbirth?” Kenyatta (1965:141) observes that “the parents would sing for joy saying our children are brave, ee-ho (hurrrah). Did anyone cry? No one cried - hurrah!” It was bad news for the community to hear of a cowardly gesture from an initiate, more so a male. Each community expected to raise strong and bold young men to defend the tribe from outside aggression which cannot be possible by a weak hearted. Thirdly, it was a public recognition that one has passed from childhood to adulthood, and thus one could now marry. Fourthly, one was ushered into tribal secrets. Mbiti (1975:96) states that during seclusion the young people underwent a period of education in tribal life to overcome difficulties and equip them mentally, emotionally and morally. Thus, no single member, let's say of the Gikuyu tribe, could have remained uncut. Finally, every young person who is circumcised at a particular time entered a special age-group commonly known as Rika or age-mate.

Rika argues Magesa (1997:101) was the most reputable group relation established by the very act of initiation. Magesa (1997:102) further contends that such people enjoy a unique social and moral tie of loyalty and devotion with each other. They stood in the very closest relationship with each other, in spite of their geographical distance regarding where age-set members were initiated or presently living. Kenyatta (1965:114) observes, “If one member of an age-group is insulted and is physically unable to avenge the injury, the other members of his age-group will cooperate with him in attaining satisfaction. For an insult to one member of an age-group is regarded as an insult to the entire age-group… in the matter of paying off a fine… age-group, rika, will contribute toward the payment…” Magesa (1997:103) concurs with Kenyatta and shows the unique oneness validated by the simultaneous spilling of their blood. Thus, they referred to each other as brothers, and to the parents of each one of them as father and mother and their female siblings as sisters, who deserve apt respect. This practice Magesa (1997:103) argues, is replicated by the Nuer people, a Nilotic ethnic group of South Sudan.

The importance of age-sets were further amplified by the fact that they marked seasons. Thus, Kariuki (1985: 22), Bishop of Mount Kenya South (1975-76) gives a vivid description of 1918 global influenza pandemic that killed 40 million people across the globe. Those circumcised in 1919 when this pandemic was sweeping through the Kikuyu land killing tens of thousands came to be known as the Rika ria kimiri ³⁷ (age-group). Kariuki (1985: 23) and Magesa (1997: 103) further contend that the bond that was established by the Rika was often stronger than blood relationship, but maybe equated to blood-brotherhood ³⁸. Kariuki explicates his argument thus,

“Age-mates have an abiding confidence in one another, because of their common experiences during the entire process of initiation. It does not matter if a member of my age-group happens to come from as far afield as Nyeri, Murang’a, or Rift Valley. Once he enters my homestead and identifies himself as a member of my age-group, even before I have discovered his name, I welcome him wholeheartedly. I would not hesitate to slaughter a ram or a he-goat (Thenge) for my wakini [my true friend] if my personal wealth at that time allowed it. For indeed we Gikuyu still regard it as the highest honour to slaughter an animal for one’s fellow wakini (1985: 23-24).”

This public acknowledgment and acceptance of one’s age-mate depict strong ties of the Rika as to slaughter an animal for him. This gesture would be brought to light to the other fellow members of the Rika in the vicinity. They were bound together by their common experiences through the entire initiation process and would call one another wanyua wakini (your real friend). This demonstrated togetherness and trust that not only defined respect for senior age-groups but very importantly structured and knitted the community together openly and transparently.

Marriage argues Magesa (1997: 121) is a journey to attain full humanity and begins with rituals and ceremonies to establish and solidify ties of common knowledge and understanding necessary for kinship. For example, Kenyatta (1965: 165) illustrates how a girl was seemingly abducted by the young man’s female relatives and carried “…shoulder-high. The girl struggles and refuses to go with them and even to seem to shed tears, while the women giggle joyously and cheer her with songs and dances. The cries and cheers can be heard for miles around, and the Gikuyu people will know that the son of so-and-so has taken the daughter of so-and-so in marriage.” Sometimes the parents could arrange the marriage of their children to get married to a particular family from a young age. However, Daniel Nyaga of the Meru of Eastern Kenya argues that this pre-arranged marriage could not materialize if the young man or lady chose to marry elsewhere (1997: 108).

This rite of passage was crucial to the sustenance of kinship structure and had social-ethical implications as described by Kisembo (1977: 182) when he quoted an address by a Zulu pastor to a newly married couple. The pastor says to the bride: “Mapule, you should bear in mind...”

³⁷ Rika ria kimiri insinuates those circumcised when the destroyer struck the kikuyu land.

that you are married not to your husband Paul, but to his family. That means you have to identify completely with all his relatives, look after them, care for them, go out of your way to make them happy. If you do that, you will have no cause for regret." And to the groom, he says: "you, Paul, will have to do likewise with Mapule's relatives. Her people are your people and vice versa. Both of you will notice that old people in the community will tend to visit you, even for a brief moment… to show their interest in your welfare."

The social ties thus established unify and solidify the tribe as one organic whole such that the community could be mobilized quickly for a corporate activity like digging or building bridges. It was not a private affair but a family.

The study looked at external and internal influences that could have played a part in the establishment of EARM. The external circumstances were unwelcome phenomena that Africans loathed and fought against. The experiences of being prejudiced against and the dilapidating diseases forced many East Africans, particularly in Kenya to seek for socio-political solutions, Young Kikuyu Association (YKA) airs grievances, Mau Mau solidarity to take back their land and rights, hospitals to deal with marauding pandemics. Africans needed to speak out their concerns through social-political organizations like YKA and while medically, missionary doctors were able to provide the necessary injections. On the one hand, Africans had to physically, take swords to defend their human rights which had been grossly violated by the colonial masters. On the other hand, they had to acknowledge the power of western medicine over that of the African medicine man. In both ways, they had to make a paradigm shift to regain their full humanity.

Internal influences emanated from internal circumstances and experiences that were fostered and reinforced by African cultural systems. They were public and communal, enhancing collective responsibility and belonging in line with John Mbit's dictum, 'I am because we are, and since we are, therefore I am' (Mbiti, 1982:108-109). The involvement of the entire community in the affairs of an individual shows the strength of kinship and another relatedness that have to be weaved together through moral fabrics and various initiations.

Given the above discussion, the researcher shall make a few observations as to why East Africans found it necessary to walk in the light with each other in their daily life. This walking in the light has had a two-fold meaning. Firstly, it meant they are together in their belief and practice and thus in the light with one other. Secondly, they are not together and thus not in the light with each other. So the following observations are made from the perspective of the two mentioned scenarios:
Africans were exposed to a colour bar and discrimination by the colonial masters. This seems to have set boundaries between blacks and whites. This background could have influenced East Africans to readily associate with Keswick theology that divided Christians into saved and surrendered. This may have led to the rise of the "abaka", those on fire – the ones who have surrendered their lives to Jesus (Franklin, 2017) as their Lord and Saviour.

Africans found European missionaries to have medicine that worked wonders, so they associated themselves with missionary doctors who not only provided a solution for physical healing but also led them to spiritual healing. This transition could not be hidden and might have provided an avenue for second blessings teaching. This teaching set apart Christians into those who had received the blessings and those who had not.

The practice of publicly vomiting of evil through a process of psychological manipulation could have sounded well to Keswick teaching about the public confession of sin. Public confession of evil was by far the most profound circumstance that could have found a parallel with Keswick theology. Thus, those who confessed their sins were thought to be in the light with one another and vice versa.

Rites of passage were by nature steps towards full community integration. That’s why one had to undergo the ritual mostly in the full glare of entire community. This was important because of recognition by either juniors or seniors to avoid misrepresentation in various forums which could lead to taboo warranting a sacrifice to thwart danger in the community. Africans’ rites of passage could have found affinity, especially in the sanctification process as was taught by Keswick theologians. The process required step by step movement towards spiritual maturity in what was called spirit-filled life. This rendered a Christian to live a victorious life without which one was relegated to a spiritual casualty. Thus a real need to pass through the laid down process or else suffer condemnation. A circumcision candidate who cried or showed signs of cowardice during the actual operation was a great let down to the community and will have to live with stigma.

All these factors required public display because the community was one whole unit and anything affecting its stability needed the attention of everybody. In other words, all had the right to know what is happening within the community. So everything, as much as possible, had to be brought into the public scrutiny or into the light. As Mbiti (1991:174) rightly says community awareness has been critical to the security and peace of its members because an individual exists only because others exist.
Having discussed walking in the light in the missio Dei and the Kenyan socio-historical context, an exploration of the historical background of Keswick theology is vital.

2.3 A HISTORICAL VIEW OF KESWICK THEOLOGY

Naselli (2010: 45) observes that Keswick theology is not easy to describe due to its unstructured theology and different doctrinal positions. But in essence, it refers to the shared views of the doctrine of sanctification and personal holiness held by the prominent proponents of the early Keswick movement. Before the views on Keswick theology can be explored, it is of paramount importance to briefly assess the main Keswick antecedents.

2.3.1 Keswick antecedents

The genesis of the holiness tradition in America begun in the 19th century as an offshoot of Wesleyan perfectionism propagated primarily by John Wesley. The holiness tradition, in turn, influenced Phoebe Palmar and Asa Mahan of Methodist perfectionism and Oberlin perfectionism respectively. Thus, if Wesleyan perfectionism influenced the holiness movement which in turn influenced the early Keswick movement predominantly through the higher life movement, then the Methodist and Oberlin perfectionism must be holiness movement’s offspring. This could be graphically presented in the following, adapted illustration from Let go and let God: A Survey and Analysis of Keswick Theology (Naselli, 2010:77).

2.3.1.1 Wesleyan perfectionism

Wesleyan perfectionism, sometimes referred to as entire sanctification was a view held by John Wesley, a renowned evangelical preacher of the 19th century. He held the view that Christians could to some degree attain perfection in this life. Indeed he separates justification and sanctification and categorizes sin to only voluntary sinful acts. He further argues that unintentional transgressions do not hinder the best of men from being called perfect or sinless. Thus, Wesley seems not to object to the term sinless perfection (Naselli, 2008:3). He thus viewed sanctification as Christian perfection and “affirmed a second transforming work of grace that advocates the eradication of sin…. “ (Packer, 1984:132-135). Packer (1984:137-139) further 39 This is a movement from 1875 to 1920 that was conservatively evangelical. It held the view that most Christians live in defeat and that the secret to living the higher life, the deeper life, or the victorious Christian life is consecration followed by Spirit-filling (Naselli, 2010: 45).

asserts that Wesley’s doctrine of perfection emphasized the power of perfect love to counteract sinful countenance. He regarded personal knowledge of being sanctified (without known sin) as a due consequence of not breaking any known law.

It is thus critical to consider some resemblance between Keswick and Wesleyan views of sanctification. McQuilkin (1987:185-186) argues that the expression of the Wesleyan holiness appears in the Keswick growth pattern: a process-crisis-process that starts at regeneration. Thus the view that Keswick integrates the Wesleyan idea of the possibility of God entering the Christian life is in itself suggestive of the holy life. Daily victory over sin is believed to be attained by entire consecration to God in what is said to be a complete surrender that delivers the believer from the domination of the inherited sin.

Thus, Thompson (1966:14), a Wesleyan author, recorded some critical connections between Wesleyan and Keswick theology. These theologies agree that a life of victory in Christ comes through a definite crisis experience or second work of grace. They believe that sanctification could be lost and agrees on the second blessing. However, while the Wesleyan holds that the second blessing is a normal occurrence in the economy of God, Keswick teachers state that the second blessing comes after justification because of man’s ignorance of the need of being filled with the Holy Spirit (Dunlop, 2012).

These intricate beliefs underline the strife for holiness. Indeed, as illustrated above the Wesleyan movement inevitably gave birth to the holiness movement.

2.3.1.2 The Holiness Movement

In order to familiarize the reader with the emergence of Keswick theology, three offshoots from the holiness movement which had begun in 1835 shall briefly be discussed (Dayton, 1971:26). These are Methodist perfectionism, Oberlin perfectionism, and the higher life movement. It was through the higher life movement that Keswick theology grew and prospered in England and beyond.

2.3.1.3 Methodist Perfectionism

Despite Palmer’s (1807–74) claim to propagate Wesley’s perfectionism, she modified it to emphasize her teaching, known as altar theology. As Smith (1962:24) observes, according to her, there is a shorter way to holiness which she popularized through the holiness camp meetings. Thus, Methodist perfectionism stressed Christian perfection and not a consequent process (Naselli, 2008:4). These camp meetings propagated Palmer’s doctrine of sanctification. The early Keswick convention to some extent became a British equivalent of the camp meeting movement (Smith, 1962:24).
2.3.1.4 Oberlin Perfectionism

Warfield (1958.ix) claims that the higher life teaching was an offshoot of the Oberlin theology. “If Oberlin Perfectionism is dead, it has found its grave, not in the abyss of nonexistence, but in the Higher Life Movement, the Keswick Movement, the Victorious Life Movement, and other kindred forms of Perfectionist teaching”. Warfield (1958:52) observes how Asa Mahan of Oberlin experienced a movement from sanctification by works alone to sanctification by faith alone. Henceforth he would not allow any place for work in sanctification, thus seeming to get it wrong because work and prayer must go together. This knowledge led Mahan to experience a “second conversion in which he seemed to himself to rise into a higher plane of Christian living… from twilight into the full light of Christian experience” (Warfield, 1958:52).

Thus, Barabas (1952:16) recognizes Asa Mahan, as a Keswick antecedent too. Mahan and his associate Charles Finney, the primary propagators of Oberlin perfectionism, viewed holiness as the perfection of a human’s autonomous free will. They limited Christian perfection to a believer’s intent to follow the moral law and regarded Spirit-baptism as the crisis following justification that initiates Christian perfection (Naselli, 2008:21). Mahan moved to England in the early 1870s, and no doubt influenced the Keswick movement by his leadership and teaching [necessity of Christians receiving Spirit baptism] in the Oxford and Brighton Conferences that immediately preceded the first Keswick Convention (Barabas, 1952:21-24).

2.3.1.5 The Higher life Movement

It wasn’t until the publication of William E. Boardman’s influential book, ‘The Higher Christian Life’40 in 1858 that interest in the subject of higher life grew in unprecedented magnitude (Naselli, 2008:21 & Barabas, 1952:16). The central argument of the book, according to Pearce (1994:14) was that sanctification was experienced sometime after justification. This assertion must have caught the attention of the church as it sold over 100,000 copies both in America and Europe with a far-reaching influence. The book awakened a sense of spiritual poverty and powerlessness in the hearts and minds of believers and a quest for victory over besetting sins and power in Christian service. This led to a new Scriptural study on holiness (Stevenson, 1959:14). However, Abbot (1860:509) argued that the book lacked historical truth. Furthermore, the book was found by some people to have been based more on experience than scripture (Pearce, 1994:15).

In spite of criticism, the book breathed a new life into America and Britain. William Boardman began an itinerant convention ministry through which he met Robert Pearsall Smith and his wife, 40 This book guided the movement until Robert Pearsall Smith’s removal from public ministry in 1875.

Hannah Whitall Smith. The couple became prominent higher life teachers’ popularizing Boardman’s views throughout Britain in the early years of the fourth quarter of the 19th century (Brown, 1988:301).

Smith’s higher life meetings did much to set the pattern for the Keswick movement. Their emphasis was reinforced by their entry into the deeper spiritual experience (Thompson, 1966:12). They propagated post-conversion spirit baptism promulgated by the doctrine of physical thrills (Pollock, 1964:35). This is what came to be regarded as the second blessing that brought one into the way of victory by faith. The Smiths had thus, struck what they viewed to be the secret of the daily Christian life. They believed to have been delivered from the power of sin and its guilt (Barabas, 1952:18).

This understanding of sanctification was brought to England in 1872. They were the catalysts that brought lasting change in English religion (Pollock, 1964:13) as they taught Higher Life theology in Broadlands (1874), Oxford (1874) and Brighton (1875) that led to the first England Keswick convention on June 28, 1875. They did not care about denominational labels and speakers came from various denominational backgrounds. For example, “F.B. Meyer was a Baptist, A.T. Pierson, J. Elder Cumming, and George H.C. Macgregor were Presbyterians. Andrew Murray belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church. H.C.G. Webb-Peploe, H.W. Griffith Thomas, and J. Stuart Holden were Anglicans” (Thompson, 1966:13). Thompson (1966:13) notes that Keswick soon became the recognized centre of the movement.

The Smiths suffered opposition from the evangelical leadership of the day like John Charles Ryle (later Bishop of Liverpool) who adversary contrasted the Moody’s teaching from that of Brighton (Pollock, 1964:33). Their doctrine of physical thrills ended their public ministry but did not stop the spiritual fervour. The subsequent successors like Henry Bowker steered the movement away from the excesses of American Higher Life to the deepening of spiritual life (Pollock, 1964:40).

Boardman (1966:ii) asserts that the higher life proponents took Romans 6:1-14 to argue for the possibility for a believer to live as a defeated Christian. They taught that victory could be obtained through a crisis of surrender. Their theory of sanctification where a believer could enter life on the highest plane comprised the need for a second blessing, consecration and victorious life of surrender – let go and let God. These components shall be discussed in detail later.

Thus, both the Holiness and Higher Life movements contributed immensely to Keswick theology which is profoundly grounded in the sin principle. The preceding views so far articulated by the movement’s teachers bring to the fore the fundamental influence of sin in the believer. The know-how of dealing with it was of utter importance. Thus, sanctified life was not only encouraged but was seen as a hinge upon which victorious Christian life could have found an outlet. It is therefore critical for this study to discuss early Keswick views of sanctification theology. This will help to conceptualize the driving force behind the Keswick theology.

2.3.2 Keswick views of sanctification theology

The historical view of early Keswick theology has been ingrained in the teachings of prominent Keswick exponents. This section deals with major pillars that defined sanctification theology through the eyes of Keswick teachers. However, before the study engages with these historical tenets, the researcher shall briefly conceptualize the phrase, sanctification theology into the contemporary understanding of the term.

2.3.2.1 Contemporary conceptualization of sanctification theology

The Greek word that is used for sanctification in Louw and Nida’s (1989:538) Dictionary, is ἁγιασμός (hagiasmos); the process of making holy, dedicating, sanctifying/consecrating, as the operation of the Spirit making holy, causing to belong entirely to God and sanctifying work (cf.; 1 Cor. 1:2; 1 Thess. 4:3; 1 Peter 1:2). Louw and Nida (1989:538) further describes it as the careful moral behaviour that expresses one’s dedication to God’s pure way of life, upright behaviour and holy living (1 Thess 4:4, 7; Heb. 12:14), as the moral goal of the purifying process holiness and right behaviour (Romans 6:22). The opposite of sanctification, argues Louw and Nida (1989:770) is ακαθαρσία which translates as uncleanness, moral impurity, and filthiness (Romans 1:24).

Thus, Hoekema (1987:61) writing in the last quarter of the twentieth century, comes closer to the dictionary definition above: “sanctification as that gracious operation of the Holy Spirit, involving our responsible participation, by which He delivers us as justified sinners from the pollution of sin, renews our entire nature according to the image of God, and enables us to live lives that are pleasing to Him” as sons and daughters of God. Hoekema (1987:61) further distinguishes the pollution of sin from guilt. He observes, on the one hand, that guilt is a condition deserving condemnation because God’s law has been violated. However, through God’s declarative (judicial) act in justification declares us not guilty of our sin on the basis of Christ’s atoning work. On the other hand, pollution is the result of sin, the corruption of our nature that produces further sin. Thus the old and the new nature appear to coexist in the same person.
2.3.2.2 Keswick conceptualization of sanctification theology

The definition of Keswick theology of sanctification by Keswick teachers has been elusive. Indeed, there has been no single concise definition. However, Naselli (2008:28) asserts it could be possible to come up with a view of sanctification theology shared by the prominent propagators of the early Keswick movement from 1875 to 1920. This would be made possible, argues Naselli (2008:29), if activities of the Keswick week were to be traced from the first day to the fifth day. These activities shall be explored later, in this section. But meanwhile, spirited individual attempts at definition by the Keswick teachers should be considered.

2.3.2.2.1 Prof. Handley Moule

Prof. Moule writing in the last quarter of the 19th century might give general guidance: “The aim of Christians who genuinely desire sanctity: To be [like Christ]; to displace self from the inner throne, and enthrone Him; to make not the slightest compromise with the smallest sin. We aim at nothing less than to walk with God all day long, to abide every hour in Christ and He and His words in us, to love God with all the heart and our neighbours as ourselves” (Pollock, 1964:74). This view seems to reflect higher life teaching and though comprehensive, appears repetitive as many words used to describe the subject of sanctification are more or fewer synonyms.

2.3.2.2.2 McQuilkin

McQuilkin (1987:158-160), an American Keswick exponent, believes that a commonly-held view is possible. His view on Keswick teaching on sanctification is three-fold: First, at justification and regeneration, the believer is declared to have the righteousness of Jesus Christ (positional sanctification or righteousness in reformed circles). The second is an experiential sanctification or the practical daily life in Christ; this is the primary focus of the Keswick emphasis. Then, the third aspect is complete sanctification which comes only at the end of this life usually understood to be the glorification of the believer.

2.3.2.2.3 Barabas

Barabas (1952:94) a renowned writer on Keswick theology argues that in Keswick there is no holiness without the cross and the Holy Spirit is agent of sanctification. Barabas (1952:94) summarizes McQuilkin’s general belief on sanctification as the dynamics of the overcoming life into their proper perspective, as far as Keswick theology is concerned. If the study integrates 43 His book ‘So Great Salvation’ is widely considered the standard interpretation of Keswick theology.

McQuilkin experiential sanctification with the Barabas argument about the cross, this could give a working definition of Keswick theology, with regard to the focus of this study. The experiential sanctification is significant in this context because it underpins the achieving of Keswick theology of sanctification that is believed to inform EARM’s concepts and practices.

Indeed, Barabas (1952:94) argues that experiential sanctification in Keswick is best understood by use of the term counteraction. Indeed, Keswick leaders claim that God’s way of sanctification is counteraction, not suppression or eradication. They further argued that law of sin (Rom 7), has hidden potential to express the old nature which is not utterly annihilated in this life. It is a regular threat to the life of a believer. This potential is only put to subjection by the counteracting power of the Holy Spirit.

McQuilkin and Barabas attempt though moderate and descriptive, lack precision and clarity. Thus, it has been a challenge to conceptualize Keswick theology of sanctification from the Keswick point of view. This was perhaps because the Keswick teachers came from various denominational backgrounds. At the same time, their teachings were not doctrinal, but mainly devotional. Pollock (1964:67) observes, even Moody and Edward Moore could not give a precise definition of sanctification as they used scriptural phrases like the rest of Faith or the blessing, which could not satisfactorily define the doctrine of sanctification theology. In the light of this, it is critical to examine the theology of sanctification as taught by Keswick teachers.

2.3.2.3 Theology of sanctification as taught by Keswick teachers

The hallmark of the Keswick movement revolves around the theology of sanctification as was taught by Keswick teachers following a successive first convention held at Keswick on 28 June 1875.

Its catchphrase (motto) as coined by Robert Wilson during the 1882 eighth Keswick Convention was All one in Christ Jesus (Pollock, 1964:62). Also, Barabas (1952:35) observes that this motto was always placed strategically at the “entrance to the large tent in which the meetings are held at Keswick, and also over the platform…” This watchword was said to be the foundation stone upon which Keswick’s harmony held together.

The general message of the early Keswick convention was the practice of holiness expressed by what Brooke (1907:80) referred to as surrender of the will or self-release to God. Since the expectations from the Keswick Convention were “to develop the highest Christian character” practical deliverance from besetting sin was emphasized.

As indicated earlier, a brief survey on the view of sanctification shared by the prominent propagators of the early Keswick movement from 1875 – 1920 will be considered. This will be done in accordance with the five days of progressive teaching in a typical early Keswick Convention (Naselli, 2008:29). The views espoused in the Keswick convention sequence below could help explicate Keswick theology and perhaps attempt a definition. Firstly views on sin.

2.3.2.3.1 The Sin principle (day 1 and 2): the diagnosis and the cure

This is what Keswick proponents referred to as the diagnosis in which the law of sin was counteracted by the law of the Spirit of Christ (Rom. 8:2) as a means of gaining dominion over sin. In spite of the fact that Keswick teachers agreed on a likelihood of living without known sin, they rejected what they perceived as sinless perfection (Naselli, 2008:29), as was taught in Wesleyan perfection.

Certainly, the view of sin was a key concept in Keswick theology as exemplified in The Keswick’s Authentic Voice edited by Stevenson. This unique book contains outstanding addresses delivered from the Convention platform from the earlier years by speakers whose lives had been transformed by the very message they were convincingly proclaiming (Stevenson, 1959:9). Nearly half of the book addressed two fundamental topics: Sin in the believer (Stevenson 1959:23-134) and God’s remedy for sin (Stevenson, 1959:135–244). The topics covered the first two days of a typical Convention. These themes are what Naselli (2008:29) recorded as the diagnosis (of sin) and the cure (victorious Christian living) respectively.

Canon Harford-Battersby and Robert Wilson instituted the phrase For the promotion of practical holiness to chart forward the way and purpose of the Conventions. On the one hand, it was believed before true holiness can be experienced, sin in the believer had to be dealt with. On the other hand, God's remedy for sin “is summed up in one word – Jesus, whose vicarious passion of His cross, has borne the penalty and blotted out the guilt of every sin of every believer”. When the believer renounces the sin principle, desire for cleansing follows and sincere intention of walking in the light will be the due reward (Stevenson, 1959:25,137). Pollock (1964:75, 76), a Keswick historian writes, “Keswick acted on the belief that many listeners would yield and trust in an instant…. This had its dangers... There were many testimonies of a practical deliverance from the power of besetting sin.”

Therefore, to avoid Keswick meetings becoming a breeding ground for counterfeit believers, focus on sin, and its remedy received a wide treatment. The gravity of the sin principle did not only lead the conveners to allocate the first two days of the Keswick week on the subject but to hinge subsequent messages on it. The aim was to discourage a maimed walk with God, lack of Christocentric life and lack of love among the Christians. These three aspects appeared to take a central place in defeating besetting sin, against which a consecrated Christian had to declare war. Brooke (1907:79-80) argued that Keswick became a place for casting off the weight of besetting sins\textsuperscript{44} and of Christian service. It acted like a clinic where diagnosis and prescription of sin were made declaring the believer ready for the Master’s use. At least three rudimentary facts upon which Keswick teachers based their messages on sin should be surveyed.

\textit{Firstly, the carnal mind}

The carnal mind was viewed as the enemy within, the human lacking divine, that Inwood (1959:71, 75) terms deadliest to the Spiritual life. Alluding to 1 Corinthians 6-10, he conveys Paul’s realm of Ethics that challenged attending theater, dancing, nudeness and erotic entertainment. Pollock (1964:16), furthering this argument, sees a need to overcome besetting sins; gossiping, impatience and an angry countenance. Thus, in the Convention, the Ministry of conscience encouraged believers not only to attain acceptable socio-ethical standards but a full surrender as well. This is what Lees (1959:90) seemed to refer to as pure, cleansed and a healthy conscience.

\textit{Secondly, the deliverance}

When the carnal has been unveiled the natural consequence would be deliverance from besetting sins. Hopkins (1959:162 -166) saw salvation from the penalty of sin that pollutes inner selves, as the sole reason for Keswick meetings. Thus, the need to put off the old man [old man as opposed to the flesh] (Romans 6; Ephesians 4; Colossians 3) and put on the new man. The action of putting off the old man meant putting off the old man’s clothes (habit or besetting sins). Head (1907:115) alternatively, uses the phrase death of natural man and newness of life of the spiritual man with reference to baptism into Christ (Rom. 6:3-5; and Eph. 2:6). Though this points to the mortification and vivification effects of a regenerate, it wasn’t a major concern for the Keswick theology whose interest was enhancing of a Christian character. However, sin was recognized as an ever-present snare. Therefore, there was a need to cling to Christ, our Deliverer from the law of sin and death.

Early gatherings in Oxford (1874) and Brighton (1875), viewed deliverance from sin in the light of receiving the blessing (Head, 1907:115). This view or experience was brought to England by Smith and his wife Hannah through higher life teachings. Pollock (1964:64) affirms resounding teachings on consecration and purity for eight years at Keswick leading to the heresy of sinless perfection.

\textit{Thirdly, the grace}

\textsuperscript{44} Those sins that keeps recurring in our lives (Gitari, 2014:294).
The unveiling of the carnal and the deliverance from sin was not a means to an end in themselves except by the grace of God. It is by that grace that we can share in the forgiveness of sins not because of our righteousness but by one righteous act of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Therefore, Webb-Peploe (1959:144) argues that the grace of God can quench every desire of the heart through Jesus Christ. Paul in Rom 6:14 assert that we are not under the law but by grace. The law curses but Christ delivers (Gal. 3:10-14). Stockmayer (1959:183) concurs and refers to Paul’s thorn in the flesh to avoid self-praise (2 Cor. 12:9).

In addition, Figgs (1907:106) develops the theme of grace further, to what came to be referred, in Keswick circles, as keeping. This was taken to mean, by the grace of God, the believers commit their helplessness to God to do for them more than they ask or think. This understanding may have led to the teaching about the rest of faith or what came to be negatively referred to as passivity.

Accordingly, Mackinnon (1911:121) expounding on 2 Pet 3:18 pointed out that there are two sides of Christian growth, either progress or retrogression. He encouraged the 1911 Keswick congregation to grow in grace to be of service to God. About Paul’s letter to the Romans, Mackinnon (1911:122-23) argued that baptism into Christ’s death meant possessing His holiness and pure lifestyle, i.e., dead to the persistence of sin. He declared that sin could not be eliminated from human nature. He implicitly challenged the doctrine of counteraction which he claimed was a departure from the previous Keswick teachings. He reiterated that Keswick taught possibility to exercise by faith the victory over the besetting sins through the power of our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus, Christians needed to undergo a process of what came to be referred as a second blessing, a concept which was largely influenced by the higher life movement. A crisis of consecration achieved this process.

2.3.2.3.2 Consecration/sanctification

The first two days according to Naselli (2008: 32) laid the foundation for the third day, i.e., the crisis of consecration. The emphasis was no crisis before Wednesday. So, Hopkins (1959:332-33) states that consecration/sanctification was a dedication/committal of the whole being on the one hand, and on the other hand, conformity to Christ’s character. Boardman (1966:iii) was of the view that the Christian who senses his need of sanctification could enter into the blessings of Romans 6:1-14 through surrender or consecration. These truths of Romans 6 could be appropriated through surrender and faith, and the only surrender acceptable to God is the surrender of the entire life (Pearce, 1994:58). Boardman (1966:iii) contends that crisis prepares a man for surrender and surrender is the entrance into a life of faith on a new and...

45 Edmond (2002:13) contends that sanctification by crisis is rooted in John Wesley’s doctrine of Christian perfection.
higher plane. The believer must believe that he is dead to sin and alive to God to experience deliverance. Thus, victory depended upon daily reliance upon Christ to defeat sin and use Christ’s power with a view to having dominion over temptation (Boardman, 1966:iv).

Thus, the Keswick writer, McQuilkin (1987:178) speaks of why this view of sanctification has been referred to as the victorious life. It is believed that a decision could initiate victory at a point in time. Thus, the new person in Christ can choose the right consistently. Such a person shouldn’t willingly infringe the known will of God.

The victorious life or the victory in Christ’s movement was promoted by Charles Gallaudet Trumbull (Warfield, 1958:351). It is said that he often began his discussions by prudently explaining that justification and sanctification are two separate gifts of God obtained independently through different acts of faith. He appeared to base his argument on Wesley’s error of separating sanctification from justification (Warfield, 1958:355).

This view suggests that consistent victory depends upon the continual exercise of faith. This meant that the believer must avoid all self-reliance or energy of the flesh when seeking to obey God’s commands. The Christian shouldn’t employ effort but give his battle to Christ for victory (Boardman, 1966:iv). Trumbull (1984:48, 84) concurs with Boardman in his argument that the secret of full victory is faith. Jesus has done it all and effort has no place in a victory over the power of sin because it (effort) thwarts victory. To understand the significance of consecration in the life of Keswick gatherings, are its two main strands, namely; crisis and process, and the Christian walk deserves elaboration.

Firstly, Crisis and process

Hopkins (1959:333) a formative Keswick theologian justified his argument by quoting from 2 Cor 7:1, where he singles out separation from defilement as a single definitive and decisive action. The act of cleansing ourselves is decisive and brings to the fore the aspect of the crisis in a believer. He also quotes Ephesians 4:31 where he asserts that putting off evil habits and laying aside every weight (Heb 12:1) point to a crisis. Pollock (1964:74) addressing the issue of crisis and the process claims that a crisis experience (surrender and experience) was a prerequisite to entering the higher life.

Besides, Naselli (2010:105) outlines Hannah Smith’s twofold description of surrender in the light of let go and let God. That is, entire surrender or complete abandonment (let go) and absolute faith (let God). These two steps or twin doors of faith and surrender were necessary “in order to enter this blessed interior life of rest and triumph.” “Man’s part is to trust, and God’s part is to work... The believer can do nothing but trust; while the Lord, in whom he trusts, actually does the work...”
Commenting on the twin door, Naselli (2008:33) associated step one with surrender - let go (Jesus becomes the Master of the believer’s life) and step two with faith - let God (God was to keep the believers from the power of sin). Thus, the sum total of step one and two equals consecration. The secret to consecration was trusting (not trying), resting (not struggling). Figgs (1907:99) understood the rest of faith, as a state of calm in the Lord in the midst of strife and desolation referred by some people as quietism. It was believed that passivity allowed God to work through an individual by promptings and impressions and that annihilation of selfhood was fundamental (Packer, 1984:155-157).

When it comes to a process, Hopkins (1959: 335-337) cite Col. 1:11, which points to an idea of spiritual strengthening, progressive purity (1 John 3:3) and transforming of character (Rom. 12:1-2). He argues that consecration is repeatable in the sense of restoring back – “see that, every morning, and every day, and many times during the day, you can say Amen to the fact that you have handed yourself wholly to Him”. Holden (1911:154) in reference to Jonah 3:1 reckons that there is a second chance for those who had ceased to follow Christ. This is made possible because of our confidence of God’s marvelous love made manifest in Jonah’s going back to Nineveh where he had hitherto dreaded to go.

Naselli (2008: 24) notes that Frederick Brotherton Meyer taught three steps of crisis experience; conversion, consecration and the anointing of the Spirit. Meyer, who was a Baptist minister, spoke at the largely Anglican Keswick Convention twenty-six times, and he successfully spread the Keswick message to America and beyond. Naselli (2008:23) observes that Hopkins attained crisis of surrender and faith in 1873 following higher life messages under Robert Smith and Boardman in England. Hopkins later led Harford-Battersby, one of the founders of Keswick, to enter the rest of faith.

Edmond (2002:13) understandably and helpfully attempted to clarify what sanctification by crisis meant from the perspectives of the Holiness and the Pentecostal traditions, ascribing entire sanctification to the former and second blessing to the latter. While he recognized the sanctification by crisis terminology, it is currently insignificant, and he identifies its theological position of a second, definite and decisive experience, following regeneration, by which the Christian believer is sanctified. It’s a crisis moment, sometimes preceded by much distress for the believer.

Inwood (1959:117) however, sounds warning by asserting that one of the most efficient ways in which the devil hinders the work of Christ in the hearts of God’s children is putting before them a counterfeit consecration, a counterfeit Christian. Thus, the congregations at Keswick were solemnly charged to exercise discernment with regard to false and genuine consecration and were encouraged to crown Christ as King in their hearts (Inwood, 1959:123). Brown (1959:124) commenting on 1 Samuel 15:14 encouraged the believers to shun defective consecration likened to Samuel’s probe on Saul’s plunder that ought to have been slain. The unconscious sin required to be made conscious and cleansed by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. This argued Brown (1959:126), happens when supplicants go back to Calvary -to the Cross of Christ –confess their defective obedience and avoid being a religious deceiver.

Secondly, the Christian walk

Mantle (1911:165) tackles the theme of a Christian walk from the perspective of a great song based on Rev. 5:9-14. The song47 suggests that believers shall overcome by the word of their testimony in retrospect to the victory of the Lord Jesus at the cross, death, and resurrection. Webb-Peploe (1959:255) asserted that the command to be perfect is predominant in almost every epistle, but people dread it. He noted that all apostles spoke well of it and seemed to encourage people to seek moment by moment the fullness of Christ (Eph. 4:13) though he acknowledged none could reach perfection. However, walking into a new experience argues Shipley (1959:258), is a matter of faith. Joshua 1:4-9 elucidates walking in God’s presence as a requisite of full surrender. Thornton (1959:261) further contends that this isn’t a do-nothing calling but doing all that the Lord commands (John 2:5) as a matter of trust and to obey.

While addressing the subject of the rest in Christ as a condition of the soul to enable believers to walk closely with God in their daily life, Harford-Battersby (1959:265,267) warns against the heretical teachings of his day. On the one hand, that perfection is attainable; consequently no further attempt to walk closely with God. On the other hand, the assumption that falling back is a necessity after conversion. However, Pollock (1964:34) asserts that what mattered was God’s power to keep the consecrated soul and not human struggle. Pollock (1964:28) further noted that Evan Hopkins, one of the great teachers at Keswick, contended that the nobleman’s son was cured because his father arrived at a crisis- passing from seeking faith to a resting faith- and this kind of faith lacked in Victorian Christianity.

2.3.2.3.3 Spirit-filled life

The activity of Spirit-filling occupied day four in which prescription for spiritual growth was administered to avoid any setback. Naselli (2008:33) notes that Spirit-filling was at work at the beginning of the crisis of consecration and continues through the life (of only consecrated believers) of surrender and faith.

Reading from Ephesians 5:18, Morgan (1911:180-81) reiterates that these words (Spirit-filling\(^\text{48}\)) were addressed to the saints. He attributes the Ephesian phrase be filled with the spirit as to refer to heavenly calling with earthy responsibilities of Christian conduct. This is our inheritance, being sealed by the Spirit –possession of God- following regeneration. Robert Pearsall Smith’s main reason for coming to Keswick was to promote the full sanctification of believers (Pollock, 1964:32). Packer (1992:110-111) articulates that this blessing was an experiential event triggered by God subsequent to the new birth (first experience). It leads to an elevated full and genuine level of Christian living that regularly overcomes sin by the power of the Holy Spirit. Packer further asserts that this idea was founded on Wesley’s doctrine of entire sanctification. This doctrine, sometimes referred to as Christian perfection or perfect love, states that sin is rooted out rendering evil desires and motives obsolete; part of the blessing of heaven. However, higher life and Keswick teachers modified Wesley’s idea of sin eradication into counteraction of it, a term which also came to be contentious.

Figgs (1907:106) argued that the blessed experience becomes a reality when one gets filled with the Spirit, as a sponge fills with the water. Thus, Holden (1911:187) asserts that Christians were encouraged as they left Keswick to the environment that could fill most of their daily chores. He argued that those were the environments to testify about the reality of God’s will in all circumstances. Thus, Hopkins (1911:209) called upon Christians to give a testimony of the definite blessing as to have their conscience at rest. Harford-Battersby, as we have seen, had rested his faith in Christ (acknowledged the blessing) at the end of one of the Keswick conferences (Pollock, 1964:29).

Hannah Smith appealed to believers to attain a complete salvation in this life, from the power and dominion of sin. Spirit-baptism according to Hannah was a preserve of some people although Hannah and her husband never lived happily (Naselli, 2008:22). The couple was accused of spreading American perfectionism – sinless perfection of the flesh. Moody referred to the fall of Pearsall Smith as a dreadful stumbling block (Pollock, 1964:66). This is because Smith’s teaching continued even after exiting the Keswick’s ministry (Pollock, 1964:26). Consequently, most of Keswick missionaries took Smith’s theology to the mission fields.

\(^{48}\) The early Keswick proponents (including Hopkins) generally use Spirit filling and Spirit-baptism terminology synonymously, but in the 1900s Keswick proponents gradually began to use Spirit-baptism terminology for what all believers experience at conversion and to reserve spirit-filling terminology for what only some believers experience subsequent to conversion. This adjustment helped distinguish Keswick from Wesleyanism and Pentecostalism (Naselli, 2008:33).
2.3.2.3.4 Keswick missions

Christian service took centre stage on the fifth day with a sharp focus on Soul-winning and foreign missions. This was a due consequence for consecrated and Spirit-filled believers. Accordingly, Inwood (1911:233), during his closing address challenged the Keswick gathering to contemplate on the commission of the Lord Jesus to his disciples (John 11:21-22). It was evident to him that missionary passion ought to be the outcome of the fullness of the Spirit.

However, initially Keswick’s message was aimed at reaching out to Christians and not heathens, and that people were sent out to the mission field as Keswick missioners and not as missionaries (Stock, 1907:137-38). It was not until 1888 that Bowker (chairman of Keswick) accepted the missionary work saying, consecration and the evangelization ought to go together. This led to the official sponsorship of missionary meetings (Pollock, 1964:83). Keswick missionaries, as well as missioners, were mandated not to start their missions. Keswick missionaries in the field, irrespective of denomination, were funded through recognized mission societies (Stock, 1907:138; and Pollock, 1964:89). Keswick avoided starting its mission which could not only have proved expensive but could have worked against its interdenominational ideals.

Every year there was a special missionary gathering referred to as A Morning with the Missionaries where remarkable speeches from the various mission field were delivered. For instance, Bishop Tucker of Church Missionary Society (CMS), Uganda; Rev. H.S. Gamman of Congo Balolo Mission; Mrs. Gates of South Sea Evangelical Mission, Australia and The Rev. Evan Mackenzie of the Scottish Mission in the Eastern Himalayas (Keswick Week, 1911:244-247). This interdenominational Keswick mission had a significant contribution to the world of missions, despite earlier fears. It was within this context that Joe Church arrived in East Africa as a representative of Keswick faith that had influenced Christian undergraduates of the Cambridge Christian Union in 1920s with victorious life teachings/second blessings/deeper holiness or simply the Highest (Church, 1981:14).

This section has explored the historical view of early Keswick theology. It established that its foundation has been based on the five topics that constituted the five days of the Keswick week convention as was taught by the prominent Keswick exponents. These seem to form the core pillars that defined sanctification theology from the perspective of the Keswick teachers. However, due to its interdenominational character, it has been difficult to arrive at a standard definition. Nevertheless, it can be said in principle that sanctification theology is a definite experience following regeneration and the subsequent ongoing crisis of consecration, which paves the way to a Spirit-filled life for powerful Christian service, epitomized in soul-winning and overseas mission.

Thus, the influence of the Keswick antecedents steered by Wesleyan perfection gave Keswick theology a unique expression that found acceptance among some evangelicals in America and Europe, before finding its way to East Africa in the early 20th century. The question of what might have attracted Keswick theology to the East African soil begs an answer.

2.4 AFFINITY BETWEEN THE SOCIOLOGICAL CIRCUMSTANCES AND THE KESWICK THEOLOGY

The answer to the question why was EARM attracted to Keswick theology cannot be overstressed. This is because the affinity between sociological predisposition of much of East African social life and the Keswick theology seems to have a natural and fundamental bond. The bonding has enabled Keswick theology and East Africa sociological worldview to have some significant exchange of concepts and meanings. It thus needs scarce elaboration that the claim of the affinity of Keswick theology and EARM’s sociological circumstances has a positive implication. The question will be answered from six-pronged influences onto the East African’s social life at the dawn of Keswick theology. These are racial segregation, faith in supernatural, community ethics, rites of passage, blood symbolism and seclusion period.

2.4.1 The affinity on the segregation of human beings

By the time of the advent of the bearers of Keswick theology in East Africa in the first twenty years of the 20th century, East Africa was just emerging from the effect of the 1st World War. One of the most outstanding results was for African soldiers to realize they were prejudiced and discriminated against by the colonial government (Sagay & Wilson, 1978:371). The white soldiers were rewarded with the land while Africans became squatters in their land. As if that was not enough the best of Kenyan land, the so-called the white highlands were exclusively reserved for European settlers. The schools and hospitals were equally racially segregated. The preceding led to a policy of separate development aimed at protecting the European civilization in East Africa (Odhiambo et al., 1977:155). Such policies among others like taxation, labour, and kipande (the identity card) system directed against Africans, made Kenyans tenants.

The teachings of Keswick theology tended to discriminate one Christian from the other (please see page 4, foot note 9). This description outlines two levels of Christians. Barabas (1952:33) observes that those invited as speakers at Keswick Convention were neither the eloquent preachers nor renowned theological professors but the ones “who can bear testimony to a definite experience of the fullness of blessing.” In other words they must have experienced a crisis of consecration after Spirit-filling without which they would be segregated simply because they have not surrendered themselves entirely to God.

The fact that this view was held by Canon Battersby and Evan H. Hopkins, key founders of Keswick convention indicates the kind of teaching that was carried out to the mission world. Certainly, a survey of three graduates of Cambridge will suffice to illustrate the spread of Keswick teachings in East Africa.

2.4.1.1 George Pilkington

Pilkington had a heritage of the Keswick teaching as a student at Cambridge 1885 – 1887. His fundamental significance to EARM was his testimony at the 1896 Keswick Convention in Uganda about the work of the Holy Spirit (Harford-Battersby, 1899: 23- 34, 261). He and other CMS evangelical Anglicans diagnosed the shallowness of the conversion of their adherents and thought a revival was the remedy. In 1893 he inspired a revival in a limited way in Uganda.

2.4.1.2 Leonard Sharp and Algie Stanley Smith

Algie Smith (Langley and Kiggins, 1974:200) who co-founded the Rwanda mission with Leonard Sharp was the son of Stanley Smith50 one of the leaders of the Cambridge Seven (Pollock, 1964:71). They had deep evangelical convictions and missionary vision. They initially met at CICCU and like many other Cambridge students influenced by Keswick movement had concluded the only way to reciprocate Christ’s love was to surrender their lives to His service in a foreign land (Guillebaud, 1959:11). They arrived at Mengo hospital between 1914 and 1915 and entered Gahini, Rwanda, an outpost of the Anglican Church of Uganda in the early 1920s (Nthamburi, 1991:189).

2.4.1.3 Dr. Joe Church

Dr. Church, according to Osborn (2000:55) had a conversion experience in his student days at Cambridge in 1920. He was an active member of CICCU which was quite influential in foreign missions. Makower (1999:27) observes that CICCU thrived after Dwight Moody’s revival at Cambridge and through the missionary zeal of the Cambridge Seven51. A favourite book among 50 Stanley Smith and C.T. Studd were members of the Cambridge seven. They had experienced crises and endowment of power that started the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union (CICCU) missionary zeal (Pollock, 1964:68, 71).

51 A young band of birth and wealth and athletic prowess whose going out as missionaries to China early in 1885 caught the imagination of the nation and profoundly moved universities. C.T. Studd and Stanley Smith, the leaders, both had experienced crises of consecration and endowment of power. The Seven brought their own alma mater and its CICCU to a peak of evangelistic zeal (Pollock, 1964:71).
the Cambridge students on How to Lead a Victorious Life had immense influence on the young Dr. Church’s spiritual and theological formation, particularly on daily victorious life. Thus, in June 1928, Dr. Church, a Cambridge-educated and Anglican physician with a background in the Higher Life or Keswick movement, took charge of an unfinished hospital located in the first station established by the CMS in Gahini, Rwanda (Pahls, 2011:74).

Thus, the arrival of bearers of Keswick teachings to East Africa met with Africans who were already used to the idea of discrimination. Consequently, a teaching about a crisis of victorious life or receiving a blessing that would predispose an individual or a group of people to privileges over and above others who don’t think or feel like them was after all not difficult to comprehend. This tendency might have contributed to the proliferation of the prosperity gospel in some African churches, especially the mushrooming Pentecostal churches.

2.4.2 The affinity with faith in the supernatural

Apart from racism and segregation, Keswick theology found in East Africa a fertile ground for helpless people in the face of diseases and famine. Keswick teaching on the higher life of surrender and victorious living could have made sense to African situation open to anything that could herald hope. The teaching of surrender and faith or let go and let God could have been understood as magical. Africans were already used to submitting themselves to a mundu mugo (medicine man) who on their behalf would expunge ailments, witchcraft or engage malevolent spirits. Traditional Africans had full trust in mundu mugo who also provided them with protective gear like amulets and talismans that were endowed with the power to prevent accidents and diseases (Wambugu et al., 2006:194). So it would not have sounded strange for them to surrender their entire being to the supernatural to defeat the present malady.

Likewise, Keswick’s emphasis on self-release to God for consecration to conquer the power of evil/sin would have been understood as cleansing from evil spirit through God’s agency – the medicine man. Thus the traditional way of dealing with evil would have provided a replica/model in Keswick theology’s expression of victorious life over sin.

2.4.3 The affinity with the community ethics

Community fabrics were highly regarded. This seemed to hedge around most of the African lifestyle from birth to death. Mbiti’s (1982:109) dictum, I am because we are, and since we are, therefore I am, defines African concept of a community. That is, I am because we are related. This signature symbolized shared communal existence. Anything or anybody found contravening the accepted social norms was swiftly reprimanded and a sacrifice made as a way of propitiating the spirits. Karanja (2012:147) observes that the victim was psychologically taken through a cleansing ritual as a way of recanting the wrongdoing.

This view of the treatment of the victim could have had the closest affinity with Keswick theology with regard to Keswick spiritual clinic that addressed the sin principle with terms like diagnosis and prescription. Thus, an African or Kenyan for that matter would have quickly felt at home with Keswick theology.

2.4.4 The affinity with the rites of passage

The rites of passage ceremonies were the preserve of majority of African cultures even before the arrival of western Christianity. Keswick theology concept of second blessing after regeneration that ushered a believer to a status of Christian victorious living or “spiritual maturity” would have found affinity with some Africans rites of passage. The early Keswick movement emphasized Christian experience that set apart Christians from the rest; thus, the rise of a concept of two sets of Christians was inevitable. This doctrine could have had consequences on the East African soil.

So that a Kenyan Gikuyu youth could graduate to a privileged status of adulthood, he or she had to undergo a rite of passage called circumcision (cut). Following the cut, the initiates attained exempt status. He could marry, own a hut and could be expected to defend the tribe against enemies. Since Keswick theology found an African context that respects rites of passage, a Gikuyu person could have easily seen the sense of one group of individuals having a more recognized status than others. In fact, the young people who underwent the cut together were referred to as age-sets or Rika as explained earlier.

The Rika group protected and loved each other. They referred to one another as brothers and sisters and their parents as fathers and mothers (Kariuki, 1985:23; Magesa, 1997:103). Also, the senior age-sets were to be respected as elders by the junior age-sets as exemplified by the Nandi of Kenya age-sets system (Magesa, 1997:105). Similarly, the gathering at Keswick was organized and facilitated by prominent leaders of the movement who must have stood out amongst others with respect to the moment they had experienced a crisis of full surrender. Thus, the respect for senior age-sets could have found affinity in the Keswick hierarchical structure. That’s notwithstanding, the Keswick and the Rika structures cultivated a mutual love for their respective members. This must have inspired the emerging Brethren Christians to express themselves as brothers and sisters.
2.4.5 The affinity with blood symbolism

The practice of the pact of blood brotherhood, where young people would exchange and share their blood symbolized and expressed life. This signifies giving one’s life over to the other (Magesa, 1997:106). In other words, they became blood friends and would never betray the other. They often have had stronger bonds than kinship ties. Keswick theology taught that for one to qualify to Spirit-filled life and thus be full partakers of victorious life, one had to surrender their lives by faith in God. One was expected to let go and to let God, i.e., to live the life of the other (God). Blood brothers could have found semblance in the concept of living the life of the other and thus could have easily embraced Keswick theology. Barabas (1952:35) notes that the most enduring feature of the Keswick Convention was the oneness of Spirit among Christians. No wonder, All one in Christ Jesus had been the prevailing theme at the Convention meetings. Perhaps, that’s why Brethren cares so much for each other.

Apart from the above use, blood symbolism was also used during various sacrificial rituals to counteract the acts of an evil spirit. Since the Gikuyu people believed that goats have a protective prodigy, its sacrificial blood was commonly used to quench evil spirits (Wambugu et al., 2006:190). The victory of Jesus at the cross illustrated in Rev. 5:9-14 (Mantle, 1911:165), signifies the power of Christ’s blood over the dominion of evil. Thus, Keswick theology could not have found better affinity than in the East African context. The shedding of Christ’s blood at Calvary would have sounded clear bells, for example to a Gikuyu of Kenya who use (d) the blood of goats to appease the evil spirits.

2.4.6 The affinity with seclusion period

The initiates had a special time before and after circumcision to learn about the history of their people, their beliefs, and practices, and importantly how to raise a family (Mbiti, 1975:94). The seclusion period among the Gikuyu took up to eight days. The third day was the day of actual operation and was marked by the initiates discarding their children’s cloth and putting on the youth’s garment symbolizing the imminent transition from childhood to adulthood. This action resembled the Keswick week’s exhortation that challenged the members attending the convention to put off the old man’s clothes, i.e., habits or besetting sins and put on the new man’s clothes. Head (1907:115) described this action as a death of natural man and newness of life of the spiritual man with reference to baptism into Christ. This outstanding likeness would no doubt have provided a fitting environment in East Africa for the proliferation of Keswick theology.

The previous action is expounded by further events following the seclusion time when the youths were received in their respective homes with a ceremony (Wambugu et al., 2006:90-
Mbiti (1975: 96) argues that returning home was like a new birth, new, full and responsible people who may acquire new names and new roles. Wambugu et al. (2006:101) state that the young initiates were now referred to as anake (young men) and as airitu (young women). The circumcised group took a particular name after the most significant event of the year. As seen earlier in this study the late Bishop Obadiah Kariuki’s circumcision group of 1919 assumed the name Rika ria kimiri (Kimiri age-set), following the global epidemic that annihilated tens of thousands in Gikuyuland (Kariuki, 1985: 22).

The yearly five-day Keswick week convention in some way was similar to an African setup of seclusion discussed above. Evidently, from the African perspective, those who persevered to the end, would be regarded to have had undergone the cut. That is, they have experienced spirit-filled life, after the crisis of consecration. They would be considered to have attained spiritual maturity and thus privileged to undertake responsibilities on behalf of the Keswick movement or community.

Thus, in spite of the difference in the number of days between the Gikuyu seclusion period and the Keswick week the affinity was outstanding. The fact that groups of people pursuing similar interest would meet for some days would have found affinity with East African people at the dawn of Keswick movement.

In this section, an attempt has been made to answer the question why was EARM attracted to Keswick theology. It has been found that East Africa sociological bonding with Keswick theology had profound parallels. Thus, the claim of the affinity of Keswick theology and EARM’s sociological circumstances cannot be overstretched. This combination, no doubt led to the emergence and growth of EARM with remarkable higher life undertones propagated through Keswick teachings. These teachings permeated EARM’s lifestyle impacting the church’s participation in the missio Dei.

2.5 EVALUATION OF THE EARM AGAINST MISSIO DEI

The preceding discourse hints at what led to Keswick theology getting attracted to East Africa and consequently pervading its daily life. As a result of this contact, certain features have been most dominant and shall be condensed into four manageable segments which will help evaluate EARM against missio Dei. They include but not exclusively to, the exposition of the scripture, centrality of Christ, public testimony and legalism. These features define the movement’s religious identity within a framework of walking in the light.
2.5.1 Exposition of the Scripture

Brethren are ardent readers of the Bible albeit thematic devotions. They make little attempt at Exegesis and thus lacks a theological dimension. This seems to have been a historical problem whereby some founders of Keswick theology like Robert and Hannah Smith had little or no theological education and training. Thus, the Smith’s mishandling of Romans 6:6 (Naselli, 2010:102), consequently amplifying higher life messages of second blessing leading to a religious hypocrisy (Pollock, 1964:36). Though EARM did not embrace teachings of a 2nd blessing, it nevertheless, inherited their literal approach to Scriptural interpretation oblivious of the context. The reading of the Ephesian 5:14 has been blamed for the split in EARM (Nthamburi, 1991:117) resulting to some members aligning to Arise and others to Stand factions.

According to Bosch (1991:426), the historical world is a constitutive element in the understanding of mission and not just a peripheral state for the church’s mission. Moreover, Wright (2006: 279) argues against spiritualizing interpretations particularly when the typological method of relating the Old Testament to the New Testament as if Old Testament merely foreshadows the New, thus losing its historical significance. The Bible shows that when it is read correctly, it challenges readers to recognize their participation role in the God’s mission as to avoid the Pharisaic hypocrisy of religious justification.

The historical-critical scholarship could be a formidable mission tool to help members of EARM in the Biblical application to participate fully in God’s mission. It is by so doing that we shall agree with Paul sentiments, “I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord beseech you that you work worthy of the vocation where you have been called” (Rom. 15:18-19). This realization is important because the success of Church’s mission is the Lord’s work, done the Lord’s way. Indeed, a successful mission of the church must be found at the cross of Christ.

2.5.2 Centrality of the Cross

The Brethren’s emphasis on the cross of Christ as the basis of their salvation no doubt puts evangelical Christian orthodoxy into its right perspective of proclaiming the Gospel and calling the world to repentance and faith. Wright (2006:314) argues that the cross was the inevitable cost of God’s whole mission and unavoidable centre of our mission because all Christian mission flows from the cross. Thus, the centrality nature of Christ in the salvation of the world provides a critical link for the missio Dei in the Old and New Testaments.

Osborn (2000:87) observes that the overriding theme of the revival meetings and Keswick conventions were the messages of sin, repentance, and forgiveness by the blood of Christ. Osborn further states that Joe Church and his associates were said to preach only the crucified Christ (2000:87). Senyonyi (2013:4), a Ugandan Brethren scholar, has been specific about Revivalists statements with regard to the centrality of Jesus in their preaching and teachings, based on the belief that Jesus paid the price for their sins. Thus, the name Jesus and the Cross have been viewed synonymously. Brethren pray the Holy Spirit to show them only Jesus because to them real revival is walking with Jesus, victoriously, moment by moment, day by day. However, when this spirituality is viewed from the perspective of missio Dei, it seems to lack balance. Wright (2006:315) claims that the cross must permeate both social and evangelistic engagements. Although the EARM appears to understand this to the fullest, their application of it tends to lean inwardly towards self rather than outwardly towards those outside their camp. Thus, tends to fall short of holistic mission informed by a comprehensive mission of the cross.

Bosch (1991:390) also observes that following the Willingen Conference of 1952, the mission came to be understood as flowing from the very nature of God, thus Trinitarian. There is no doubt that God affirmed His supremacy in missions by confirming supremacy of His Son, Jesus Christ as the conscious centre of the Church (Piper, 2001:133). Thus, EARM’s Christocentric emphasis could be understood in that perspective. But it becomes a problem when the Trinitarian thrust of mission appears blurred within the revival fellowships that mostly focus on one member of the Trinity. Bosch (1991:390) observes the doctrine of the missio Dei as God the Father sending the Son, and the Father and the Son sending the Spirit, and the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit sending the Church into the world. Thus, a movement towards Trinitarian worship and holistic mission needs to be encouraged as a new model in EARM’s theology of mission. This realization should pervade not only Brethren’s worship pattern but also be the basis of their public testimony.

2.5.3 Public confession

We have seen public confession of sins has been rooted in both the Scripture and the African cultural practices. In both cases, it has earned its place in the light of setting norms and boundaries against which law is breached, and cleansing/confession required. It has been a common practice in the EARM to give a public testimony or confession. Brethren believe that by expunging their misdeed openly, they will clear their conscience not only before God but humanity as well. Winter (2010:183) observes that it is paramount for people to witness the glory of God in the lives of believers as a reason to turn away from evil to God. Perhaps that could be one of the reasons Brethren seek to confess their sins openly so that others can see and glorify God.

One of the primary scriptural passages that appear to approve public confession is James 5:16. Whereas it is right to seek assembly of the saints for confession, the amount of publicity we give depends upon how public the sin was (Matt. 18:15-17). If the sin is publicly known, then to specify it during public confession is a matter of responsible ethics of a good neighbour. However, as Price (2017) argues wisdom should be used to declaring the sin – not so much because it might seem disgraceful to tell exactly what the sin was but to spare the sinner unnecessary hardship over a sin he has repudiated. It is a good rule of scripture to say that sin should be explicitly confessed to the extent that knowledge of sin exists. This could be a real mission emphasis because it handles the complexities that could arise in the church where a public sin goes unacknowledged. Indeed, since human mission has no life of its own, except in the hands of the sending God who is the initiator of missionary enterprises (Bosch, 1991:390); acknowledging public sin is a welcome mission factor. If Brethren could be discreet in handling various sins, informed legalism could help participation in the missio Dei.

2.5.4 Legalism

The members of EARM display passion for God in their conventions and fellowship meetings as they achieve experiential sanctification in their lives. This practical holiness, blended with Keswick theology has not only been contextualized in EARM but has also acquired socio-ethical dimensions. There is nothing wrong with being ethical. However, the moral problem has been viewed from the perspective of creating two categories of Christians in the EARM based on beliefs and practices of walking in the light hedged with do’s and don’ts. Langley and Kiggins (1974:202) observe that conformity to an accepted pattern of behaviour becomes the gauge for one’s religious commitment and this displaces the gospel of God’s love and grace. Thus, the ensuing legalistic tendencies— do not drink; do not smoke; do not wear short skirts; do not take bank loans; do not receive or give dowry. From this viewpoint, walking in the light is not within the precepts of the mission of God. Bosch (1991:390) claims that human mission has no life of its own, except in the hands of the sending God who is the initiator of missionary enterprises.

Moral transformation by all definitions is not a problem in itself, but in the way, it has been applied or misapplied within a framework of community rules of living vis-à-vis biblical framework of an ethical community. Wright (2006:364) images ethical obedience from the perspective of walking in the ways of the Lord, as to reflect God in a just human life’s relationship within an ethical community. Therefore, the concept of walking with God is a practice that all Godly loving people ought not only to envy but also strive to achieve. Unfortunately, it seems that the ensuing ethical obedience has created a wedge in the EARM. This ethical and divisive attitude appears to put more emphasis on outward moral conformity expressed in walking in the light at the expense of the Gospel and mission Christ.

53 Cf. Keswick teachings against indulgence or amusements like beer, theatre, dance, tobacco and questionable employment. Anything done to please self apart from Christ as Master and Lord and neighbour in all things lawful, was discouraged (Pierson, 1907: 91, 93, 94).
As earlier stated, Brethren’s moral formation provides for evangelism and social responsibility, but falls short of replicating the same to those outside their camp. Unlike the past, when evangelism and Christian social action went together (Langley and Kiggins, 1974:201), it is mostly not the case currently as exemplified by Mtuko ya Bwana— the Lord’s Bag (Mambo, 1973:115). The Lord’s bag has been exclusively for the Brethren’s activities oblivious of the general need in the church. David Bosch (2011:418) argues for justice to evangelism and social responsibility in dispensing the promises and gifts of the Kingdom of God. Thus, a need for a paradigm shift from the prevailing socio-ethical informed morality to a Gospel-focused mission because as Wright (2006:390) argues the mission of the church includes both verbal proclamation and ethical living. We must not be conformed to the world in any way (Romans 12:1-2), we must be careful, just because the majority of EARM accept certain ethical behaviours within their camp, it does not mean that it is right in the light of missio Dei.

Further, if a person is not a regular member of Brethren fellowships she/he would be labeled as not saved because salvation was understood and expressed through walking in the light. From this viewpoint, walking in the light is not within the precepts of the mission of God. Bosch (1991:390) claims that human mission has no life of its own, except in the hands of the sending God who is the initiator of missionary enterprises.

In this section, the researcher explored certain features arising out of contact between Keswick theology and East Africa sociological circumstances leading to the proliferation of the EARM. Consequently, an attempt has been made to evaluate EARM against missio Dei and to define the movement’s religious identity.

2.6 CONCLUSION

This chapter discussed the socio-historical circumstances that led to the influence of Keswick theology of sanctification on the EARM’s walking in the light. It has endeavoured to answer the questions concerning socio-historical conditions that provided affinity for Keswick theology in East Africa. To elucidate the concept of walking in the light, it was placed in the context of missio Dei and subsequently described in the socio-historical context of East Africa. To explore the affinity between the sociological circumstances and the Keswick theology, a historical view of Keswick theology was critical. Finally, it has evaluated the EARM against missio Dei and have established outstanding features that buttress EARM

Further, the study noted that EARM has not only contextualized much of its inheritance from Keswick but also seems to have gone a notch higher in its expression of practical holiness. The socio-historical concept and practice of walking in the light appear to have underpinned the boundaries within which the saved ones ought to trace their daily walk with God. Thus, while Keswick theology seemed to herald in a new dawn of spirituality in East Africa in the wake of seemingly dry orthodoxy, it has nevertheless taken a contextual perspective fashioning a theology with an African face. In order to comprehend the emerging theology it is critical to examine the place of Anglican scholarship on Keswick theology of sanctification from the viewpoint of historical and empirical perspectives of walking in the light within EARM.

CHAPTER 3. ANGLICAN SCHOLARSHIP ON KESWICK THEOLOGY OF SANCTIFICATION AND WALKING IN THE LIGHT IN THE EARM

3.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter focuses on the Anglican Church’s scholarship perspective on Keswick theology as propagated by scholars of Anglican or non-Anglican Church origin. The scope incorporates an overview of the Anglican scholarship from the viewpoint of historical literature and documents on the one hand, and the findings and the analyses of the current situation on the other. It is divided into five parts.

Part 1 Introduction

This part introduces the issues that provide a platform for engaging and investigating the existing historical nature of church scholarship. It also brings to the fore the current situation of the influence of Keswick theology on EARM’s social-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light in the light of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region.

Part 2 Historical overview of the Anglican Church Scholarship

The study of Anglican Church Scholarship on Keswick theology’s influence on EARM’s walking in the light is yet to attract more interest from scholars. Even today, the Anglican-Keswick theology scholarship and EARM’s walking in the light has not been given the prominence it deserves in churches and theological institutions in East Africa. Indeed, the suggestion by the GAFCON 2013\(^{55}\) meeting in Nairobi that the Anglican Church should return to the faith of EARM confirms this lack. Certainly, this failure has prevented it from occupying its proper place in shaping mission in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region.

This section, therefore, offers a fresh historical overview of the nature and influence of the Anglican Church scholarship on the emerging social and ethical beliefs, and practices of walking in the light and suggests a viable perception. The aim is, therefore, to situate the Anglican Church scholarship in Keswick theology and walking in the light in the Anglican Church of Kenya.

This section deals with the Anglican Church scholarship concerning historical literature and documents. A highlight of key scholars will serve to assess credibility and authenticity of information. The work of these scholars forms the backbone of the summarized history of the genesis and spread of the revival to Kenya.

Part 3 Nature and current trends regarding Anglican Church scholarship on Keswick theology influence on EARM’s walking in the light: findings and analyses of the prevailing situation.

This part analyses the data collected from oral and email interviews. It is graphically presented.
Based on the findings, the study assesses the nature and current situation concerning the influence of Keswick theology on walking in the light. The study used qualitative approaches and conducted self-administered/email interviews on the EARM’s leadership, ordinary membership, theological students, clergy, bishops and prominent stakeholders. This part comprises various sections which examine issues ranging from demographic distribution of respondents to understanding of the Anglican Church scholarship on the influence of Keswick theology in EARM’s concept of walking in the light in Mount Kenya region.

Part 5 Conclusion

3.2 A HISTORICAL OVERVIEW OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH SCHOLARSHIP ON EARM

The East Africa Revival has touched millions of lives in East Africa and beyond, as the Holy Spirit has moved Christians to share the gospel with others. Indeed, it has been in the revival that the gospel has been powerfully used to seek and save the lost and to transform the church, rather than seeing the church conformed to the world. Since the beginning of the last century, Africa has had been crisscrossed by divergent missionary movements that heralded the Gospel of Christ. As a result, the mission field was flooded with conflicting doctrines somewhat packaged via mission agencies and personnel sent to work overseas.

Anglicans were not the pioneer missionaries in East Africa; the Roman Catholic Church was the first to set foot in East Africa in 1498, courtesy of the Portuguese explorer, Vasco da Gama (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:1). The Church Missionary Society (CMS) that heralded Protestant missionaries arrived much later in Mombasa in 1844 led by Ludwig Krapf and in 1877, Alexander Mackay arrived in Uganda (Ward, 2006:166). Both were missionaries with CMS, though from the non-Anglican denominational background. It is from the Anglican mission of CMS that Keswick theology found its entry into East Africa. CMS played a significant part in the origin and spread of EARM that influenced social-ethical life particularly in the Anglican Church in East African region. Scholars and popular writers mostly affiliated with the Anglican Church have recorded the genesis and spread of revival in East Africa. Although they appear to differ on some occurrences, they have attempted to depict the nature and characteristics of Anglican scholarship in the light of the influence of Keswick theology on EARM’s walking in the light.
3.2.1 A brief overview of Anglican scholarship on the EARM

The early Anglican Church scholarship reflects European dominance, with few having been active participants in the origin and spread of the revival. The other group of participants could be considered inactive in the sense of not being involved in the actual events. Some of these are academicians or key Revival members, both Africans and Europeans who have been engrossed in tracing the history and impacts of revival. The main active participants were; Dr. John (Joe) Edward Church and Rev. Harold Guillebaud. Dr. Algie Stanley Smith and Dr. Leonard Sharp may not have written a book/article, but Dr. Church and Rev Guillebaud have commonly cited their contributions scattered all over in the form of memoirs, and in the Ruanda notes. The study now considers a brief review of the active participants.

3.2.1.1 Active Participants

Firstly, Dr. Joe Church (not to confuse with his son, John Church), was a missionary of the Anglican descent in Ruanda Mission at Gahini, where the Movement as is known today started. There he and his African colleagues felt the need for personal renewal through a turning to the Lord and a renewal of the Church leading to the unfolding events that resulted in the revival. His book, ‘The Quest for the Highest’, is a classic book on the revival - a diary of the East African Revival in which he records chronologically the sequence of events beginning on Tuesday, December 19th, 1927 to September 13th, 1961 (1981:22, 252). His further works referred to as the “Dr. Joe Church Papers” are archived in the Martin-Henry Centre, Cambridge and gives mines of information on the genesis of the revival in East Africa (Ward & Wild-Wood, 2012:228).

The strength of this book is depicted in the way he wrote down his impression in a historical narration from 1927 – 1961. His memory of dates, places, and names of people indicate someone who was deeply involved in the revival. Indeed, without his contribution future scholars would have lost a critical source of reference for the origin and growth of the East Africa revival.

However, his presentation seems to fall in the class of popular writing and thus lacks an academic angle to it. Again, his bringing together all available records written or oral over about 35 years (Church, 1981:11) after the beginning of the revival it could lack accuracy regarding 57 Guillebaud and his family have been well represented by his daughter, Lindesay Guillebaud and his granddaughter, Margaret (Meg) Guillebaud, who have respectively authored, A Grain of Mustard Seed: The Growth of the Ruanda Mission of CMS and Rwanda: The Land God Forgot? Revival Genocide and Hope.

58 The name Ruanda was the name of Rwanda in the early years. These names will be used interchangeably in this study.
daily occurrences. Nevertheless, his habit of preserving records is a trait to emulate for the current scholars.

Secondly, the Guillebauds have given two accounts of life experiences in Ruanda in their separately written books. The Lindesay Guillebaud’s book, ‘A Grain of Mustard Seed: The Growth of the Ruanda Mission of CMS’, was written earlier than Meg Guillebaud’s book ‘The Growth of the Ruanda Mission of CMS and Rwanda: the Land God Forgot? Revival Genocide and Hope’. Lindesay’s (1917-1971) writing begins with the early years of scramble and partition of Africa by Europeans with Ruanda-Urundi falling into the hands of Belgium (Guillebaud, 1959:14). The book reveals the inner side of challenges that were facing Africans like leprosy and the effects of war. It also depicts the beginning and spread of revival. The book brings to the fore interaction of Africans brethren and European missionaries. The former received praise from Dr. Stanley Smith for playing a significant role in the revival while he accused the latter of hindering it (Guillebaud, 1959:65).

Meg Guillebaud, born in 1943 gives a vivid and personal account of missionary witness in a land which had known not only the triumphs of faith but also the terrible events of the genocide in 1994. Meg faced up to the challenge of facing up to the questions that arose, in which church leaders were implicated.

The strength of the two authors is seen in the ways they engaged in the story of succession in the Guillebaud’s family tree. They bring out the intrigues of the revival in their narration showing the tremendous work of the Holy Spirit. They also, carry the joys and pains (Meg) of all the peoples of Rwanda.

However, their weakness is in the scanty explication of the link of revival to Keswick theology except in the mention of works of Stanley Smith and Leonard Sharp who like Dr. Church had some Keswick background. Nonetheless, the books are a must-read for scholars who would like to know the joy of revival and the pain it could prevent when taught faithfully by theologically informed servants of God.

3.2.1.2 Non-Active Scholars

These are Anglicans in terms of denominational affiliations. They have selected examples based on their relevance to the subject of study. Other inclusions will be those from other faiths, writing on the influence of Keswick theology on EARM’s practice of walking in the light in the Anglican Church of Kenya.

Firstly, Rev Dr. Kevin Ward has taught in Uganda and has been a Senior Lecturer in Theology and African Religious Studies at the University of Leeds (Ward and Wild-Wood, 2012:xiii). He co-edited The East African Revival: History and Legacies (2012) and has written several articles on EARM. He is the author of ‘A History of Global Anglicanism’ where he has also written on the origin and spread of the EARM (Ward, 2006:175-179).

Secondly, Rev. Prof. John Karanja is a professor of Church History and African Studies at Trinity Lutheran Seminary in Columbus Ohio. He was born in central Kenya and ordained in the Anglican Church of Kenya. He has a Ph.D. in modern history from Cambridge University and has taught at St Paul’s and Nairobi University in Kenya. His publications include a collaborative work ‘Rabai to Mumias: A Short History of the Church of the Province of Kenya, 1844-1994’ (1994); ‘Founding an African Faith: Kikuyu Anglican Christianity 1900-1945’ (1999); and ‘Confession and Cultural Dynamism in the Revival’ In Ward, K and Wild-Wood, E, the East African Revival: History and Legacies (2012). Most of his writings engage African traditional culture and Christianity for example; he compares the Gikuyu cultural way of vomiting (gutahikio) evil (thahu/taboo) with public confession in the EARM.

Thirdly, Dr. Colin Reed was congratulated by The Most Reverend Donald L. Mtetemela, the then Primate of the Anglican Church of Tanzania. He termed Dr. Reed as a gifted missionary and Christian leader who made a significant contribution to the life of the church in East Africa. His celebrated book, ‘Walking in the Light: Reflections on the East African Revival and its Link to Australia’ (2007) provides many pointers for those who want to see revival today. The book explores the main factors behind the beginning of Christian revival in Rwanda.

Fourthly, Prof. Bethwell A. Ogot has co-authored, ‘A Place to Feel at Home: A Study of two Independent Churches in Western Kenya’ (1966). Bethwell has a doctorate from the University of London (1965) and has been Head of the History Department at the University of Nairobi. A renown Kenyan historian, Prof. Ogot brings to the fore the emergence of the Christ Church in Africa (CCA) following the uncompromising stance by the Anglican Church. He gives a detailed investigation of revival in Nyanza that eventually led to Kuhama (separation) of CCA from the Anglican Church, creating Joremo and Johera factions. Joremo is a Luo word, for people of blood, i.e., signifying emphasis by the revivalists on the blood of Christ. Johera referred to the people of love, which seemed to be lacking in the Joremo and to an extent in the Anglican Church of the day.

The above scholars have researched widely on the history of revival in East Africa. Dr. Ward and Prof. Karanja are perennial Anglican Church scholars on the influence of Keswick theology in the EARM. Specifically, Dr. Ward appears to have been a consistent EARM scholar writing freely on the Balokole (referred to as Brethren in Kenya) movement in Uganda. He has laboured to see the relationship of revival and Keswick theology on the one hand, and revival, Keswick and Frank Buchman’s Oxford Group (Ward, 2012:3-5), on the other. Prof. Karanja brings the traditional cultural perspective as an influence to social-ethical life. He matches symbolic vomiting of evil to a public confession of sin. The subject of Keswick theology is only implied in his work.

Though Dr. Reed and Prof. Ogot, seem to have written once on this subject, their work is seminal in understanding the origin and growth of revival. Dr. Reed’s approach is from a historical theology point of view while Prof. Ogot takes a historical perspective. Whereas Reed’s work starts from Gahini, Ruanda (Reed, 2007:vii), Ogot’s begins from Nyanza, Kenya (Ogot, 1966:28). Another striking difference between Reed and Ogot has been on the content, whereby the former engaged Keswick theology and revival, while Ogot appears to highlight the ensuing splits.

Thus, in spite of these scholars (active and inactive) somewhat distinctive approaches in content, depth, and presentation, they seem to complement each other. This could assist the reader to get a clear perspective of the events from the beginning to the present generation. Their writings could help the researcher knit together the loose ends in the history of revival that could also unveil the connection between Keswick theology and walking in the light.

Having reviewed the main Anglican Church scholars and scholarship, a summary of the origin and spread of the revival is necessary.

3.2.2 A brief overview of the genesis of EARM

3.2.2.1 Entry of CMS into Buganda and Ruanda

Langley & Kiggins (1974:60-61) reckon that the first missionaries of the Church Missionary Society arrived in Uganda in 1878 and were warmly welcomed by the Kabaka Mutesa I. The church expanded rapidly both geographically and numerically, but the spiritual foundations were compromised with traditional culture and thirst for materialism. While Anderson (1977:22) concurs, he adds that Missionaries had lost their spiritual fire, as well. This fact was realized by the evangelical Anglicans of the CMS (Anderson, 1977:123). Ward and Anderson (2012:3 & 1977:123) saw this scenario as a precursor to the outbreak of Revival.

The other heralded cause for the revival, though presumably related to the growing nominalism in the Anglican Church of Uganda, was the activities of the Ruanda Mission. This Mission stood for “conservative evangelical theological position with regard to the Bible, promoting an urgent quest for renewal and personal holiness as understood by the Keswick Movement” (Ward, 2012:3). Indeed, the events of 1921 saw the emergence of the Bible Churchmen’s Missionary Society (BCMS), a CMS dissenter over the question of biblical authority. Henceforth Ruanda Mission, a semi-autonomous arm of CMS (Reed, 2007:16) received a mandate to guarantee that missionaries met conservative Evangelical views on the Bible. This decree could not be overemphasized as far as the ground for the Revival would be concerned.

3.2.2.2 Date of Origin/Outbreak of revival

While some scholars argue for the dates of the origin of revival to be as early as 1927 (Mambo, 1973:111), others suggest dates as late as 1935 (Ward, 2006:176). Indeed there have been some pockets of revivals ranging from personal to group levels from the end of the 1920s. The following discourse attempts to set the background that led to the beginning of the revival.

The arrival in the Ruanda Mission of the two young medical doctors, Leonard Sharp and Algie Stanley Smith, pioneer missionaries in Ruanda-Urundi appeared to set the pace. The two doctors, in their College days at Cambridge, had expressed eagerness to missionary calling at some world unreach with the Gospel. An invitation in 1914 by a renowned Missionary Albert Cook to work in Mengo Hospital, Uganda, seemed to confirm their calling (Guillebaud, 1959:12). Later, Sharp and Smith were joined in 1922 by Dr. Joe Church and his wife Decie (Ward, 2006:176). Reed (2007:19) argues that like most of the Ruanda missionaries of this period, Dr. Church was a creation of Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union (CICCU) influenced by revivalist ideals and Keswick holiness spirituality.

Perhaps this religious background, in 1929, worked in on Joe Church so that he became aware of not only his spiritual bankruptcy but that of the Anglican Church in Uganda. He met Simeon Nsibambi who seemed to share his need for Bible study, prayer, and mutual encouragement. Thus, Nsibambi and Church surrendered themselves to Christ and sought the fullness of the Holy Spirit that led to personal transformation. This realization could have had historical significance because revival Brethren (Ward, 2012:3) preferred 1929 as the date of the origin of the East Africa Revival when Joe Church and Nsibambi met at Gahini resulting in the latter supplying the mission at Gahini with committed hospital workers and educationists. It is reckoned that revival emerged first among these workers at Gahini in the 1930s and spread to other Ruanda Mission stations and Kigezi in Uganda.

However, Reed (2007:15) gives the year 1933 as the earliest date following a conference after Christmas.

59 His father, Stanley Smith was a leading member of the Cambridge Seven interested in overseas mission, no doubt he must have listened to some of Keswick teachers who frequented the University’s CICCU.

60 The Union was a powerful force in the spiritual formation of many leaders of evangelical Anglicanism of this era (and of the English Evangelical missionary movement for several generations). In the early years of the Rwanda Mission, most of the male missionaries shared this background – among others, doctors A. Stanley Smith and L. Sharp, and clergy such as J. Warren, L. Barham, H. Guillebaud and Arthur Pitts (Reed, 2006:18).
“After formal prayers, one of the Africans stood up and spoke earnestly of a personal conviction of his sinfulness, of God requiring changes in his life. He then began to confess openly what he saw as his sins. With tears, he publicly revealed the things that burdened his conscience. The atmosphere became electric, with person after person standing to follow suit. They confessed their perceived sins, with two or three speaking at the same time sometimes, as a wave of spiritual conviction swept through the group. A new dynamic had appeared in the church, with repentance as its central theme. This was perhaps the first obvious event of the Christian revival that swept through Rwanda, Burundi, Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika, and parts of the Congo from the mid-1930s onwards.”

But, Ward (2006:176) and Guillebaud (1959:7) give the year 1935 as the first outbreak of revival by hospital workers at Gahini. Ward (2006:176) further observes that Blasio Kigozi, a brother to Nsibambi brought the message of revival, a year later to the Church Synod of Uganda with a plea zuzuka (awake).

Considering the different dating by the scholars and the fact that there is no living source of information to rely on today Dr. Church’s Ruanda notes, mostly written in the first person singular, are pivotal.

“Christmas, 1933: The beginnings of the Revival at Gahini. I will copy this account of the beginnings of the outpouring of God’s Spirit as I wrote it in Ruanda notes in March 1934: There are signs that God is working. A few days ago I suggested an early Morning Prayer meeting to the hospital staff, and when I said 5 o’clock they smiled and said they were always up earlier than that praying. At 4 a.m. I found them all on my veranda waiting, and we had a wonderful two hours of prayer until it was light... The hospital staff is joining with the Evangelists’ Training School for prayer this week. There is an air of expectancy that God will give us times of real blessing (Church, 1981:98).”

Church (1981:98-99) goes on to add to his notes the beginning of a convention on Tuesday, December 27th, 1933, a date alluded to by Reed above when a wave of conviction swept through the conference, and African Christians started confessing their sins. It would, therefore, suffice to assert 1933 to be the date of the beginning of the revival as claimed by Reed and Dr. Church though as Ward (2006:176) observes the first outbreak could be traced to 1935.

3.2.2.3 Reactions/impact on the Ugandan scene

The revival message was received inversely as it moved across Uganda. Some like Blasio Kigozi took the message of revival with its catch-word zuzuka (awake) to the 1936 synod of the Church of Uganda with a three-point message. He, however, died suddenly from a relapsing fever and his message was delivered posthumously (Langley and Kiggins, 1974:198). The message which was in a question form was summarized\textsuperscript{61} as the “coldness and deadness” of the church, open sinners at the Lord’s Table and the way forward for revival in the Church of Uganda (Church, 1981:122-123). These were weighty points and could have challenged the Anglican Church of Uganda. The reactions were diverse ranging from within the mainstream churches to the missionaries themselves.

3.2.2.4 Mainstream churches

The zuzuka campaign was not well received by both the Anglican Church and the Catholic Church. Dr. Church avers that Algie Stanley Smith reported opposition and persecution from the Roman Catholic Church (Church, 1981:97). The Balokole attacks on clergy rouged both the missionaries and the African clergy the wrong way.

For example, argues Ward (2006:177), Bishop Cyril Stuart of Uganda wanted the young Balokole to train for the ministry of the church. However, their inflexible conduct led to expulsion of 26 of them from the theological college at Mukono. The administration and faculty banned revivalists’ early Morning Prayer meetings, but the Balokole stubbornly refused which led to a prolonged crisis in 1941 (MacMaster & Jacobs, 2006:55). Consequently, their leader William Nagenda refused ordination and remained a lay evangelist wishing to preach the radical message of equality particularly between the white and the black.

3.2.2.4.1 The teachers

The teachers’ reactions were diverse. On the one side of the continuum, there were those who were blaming their poor performance on too much preaching about sin to the new lifestyle propagated by the abaka (those on fire) evangelists. They complained that they have been baptized and confirmed Christians and wondered why they were required to be born again. On the other end, the accused including Blasio and Yosiya decided to pray, and later witness against Blasio recanted their evidence claiming they have since become saved (Church, 1981:113). Likewise, a headmistress of a girl’s school had to expel some girls who had sneaked out in the night for a prayer meeting (Church, 1981:118). But as Dr. Church observes some of these adamant teachers were eventually getting saved (Church, 1981:119). The ensuing lifestyle took a rigid stance resulting in a public confession of sin signaled by the revival hymn of absolution, Tukutendereza Yesu.

\textsuperscript{61} The elaborated text is: “What is the cause of the coldness and deadness of the church of Uganda? Why are people allowed to come to the Lord’s Table who are living in open sin? What must be done to bring revival to the church of Uganda?”
3.2.2.4.2 Balokole

Positively, every afternoon beginning in 1929 a United Bible study started with about 200 assembling for doctrinal instructions following great scriptural themes, starting with sin, traced out in the Scofield Bible. Eventually, these notes were enlarged and made into study book first published in 1938 by the Scriptural Union of London under the title, ‘Everyman a Bible student’ (Church, 1981:62). Church (1976:15) asserts that the subject of study was not only simplified but ran consecutively starting with God, man and sin. Thus, as Church (2006:114) avers “Bibles were used until they fell into pieces.”

Indeed, the Convention of 1935, regarded as the first to be organized by Africans at Kabale followed the pattern of a Keswick Convention closely; Sunday and Monday were quiet days, Tuesday (sin), Wednesday (repentance), Thursday (New Birth), Friday (Holy Spirit and victorious life), Saturday (Gospel Service), Sunday (Eight testimonies) and Monday (a praise meeting). Every speaker followed the Bible reading for the day and hammered the message home from a living experience (Church, 1981:116-117).

As a result, some Balokole like Simeon Nsibambi went out boasting that he could tell after shaking hands with a new missionary whether he has got the real thing in his heart or not (Church, 1981:87). Following this, some Balokole students of Bishop Tucker Theological College, Mukono, could even question their teachers on an understanding of the Bible. They engaged spirited campaigns against evils in the college like sin, theft, and immorality (Macmaster & Jacobs, 2006:54). Similarly, clerks at Entebbe were spending their weekends preaching against sin (MacMaster and Jacobs, 2006:51).

3.2.2.4.3 Missionaries and clergy

Some missionaries like Lawrence Barham were in the heart of revival and noted ongoing activities like “confession of sin, restitution, sometimes receiving strong impressions to read certain verses of the Bible which led them to put away some habits like beer drinking.” They preached in bands and stirred many people amidst opposition and a level of persecution (Church, 1981:117). But as Guillebaud (1959:65) observes through the words of Dr. Stanley Smith, the missionaries’ contribution as a body to the revival was negligible until they had received a conviction of their sins. No wonder Kosiya thought the convention of 1934 could not arouse conviction of sin because of what he termed as "people praying beautiful long prayers, many of them hypocrites he knew who needed to be broken down before God” (Church, 1981:99). This resonates with MacMaster and Jacobs’ (2006:57) observation of Erica Sabiti’s confession that many clergies including himself were not saved as illustrated by his repentance.
following a confrontation by one of the members of the congregation who questioned whether he had experienced the cleansing blood of Jesus.

Having seen the reactions in the Ugandan scene, following the start of the revival, the scholars’ perspective on the Kenyan soil is critical. This is outlined in three epochs.

3.2.2.5 Entry and spread in the Kenyan scene; 1937 – 1950

As it were with the date of the beginning of the revival, scholars seem to disagree on the year revival entered Kenya. While Dr. Church (1981:145), Mambo (1973:111) and Macmaster and Jacobs (2006:58) locate the date to 1937, Langley and Kiggins (1974:198) and Ogot (1966:28) claim 1938 to be the date of entry. If the two claims were to be considered authentic, then 1937/1938 would be regarded as the time of entry. However, it seems more credible to consider the prerogative of the Ruanda notes (on the strength of Dr. Church being a witness) in which Dr. Church cites the Convention at Kabete in Kenya, held on 30th March – 7th April 1937 (Church, 1981:145). Thus, 1937 seems like the most convenient date of the entry. This date is further confirmed by Macmaster and Jacobs (2006:58) who affirm that revival arrived in Kenya in April 1937 when Nsibambi and a team from Ruanda visited Kabete, near Nairobi where they met Obadiah Kariuki, a later bishop of Mount Kenya.

Thus, the entry of revival into Kenya through Nyanza in 1938 as claimed by Welbourn and Ogot (1966:28) among others might look a little bit off the mark. However, his survey of the spread of revival from Maseno to Ramba pastorate is praiseworthy.

The year 1938 could not be the date of entry but of a second visit to Kenya. Mambo (1974:111) observes a second revival team from Ruanda at the Pumwani CMS station in Nairobi where some Christians were saved including Anglican clergy. However, between 1938 and 1945 nothing much was heard about a revival in other parts of the country except Nyanza because of severe opposition from the established churches (Mambo, 1974:111).

In Nyanza, the revival continued to cause ripples in the Anglican Church. Besides the message of conversion and purity of heart receiving a lukewarm reception, it found a natural leader, Ishmael Noo in 1942, and by 1944 the revival membership was about 2000, organized in what Welbourn and Ogot (1966:29) referred to as small armies led by faithful followers, moving from one place to another using crude megaphones and demanding their listeners to straighten their crooked paths. They composed hymns to beckon people to get saved. Welbourn and Ogot (1966:29) aver:

“I heard the voice of Jesus say to me:
Get up, and start to work;
Start to work, because the night is near
When a man does not work. So I say,
The shepherd has sacrificed
His live for the sake of the flock,
For the sake of his flock, because he loves his sheep.
Oh! Jesus, you were an only child!
The shepherd has lost his life in order to save the sheep."

As a result, many were radically resolving to serve Christ. Welbourn and Ogot (1966:30) assert that only the first wives kept their marriage vows as others decided to leave their unsaved husbands to follow Christ. Likewise, the saved women left their unsaved monogamous husbands. It is said that from 1945, most of Noo's congregation was made up of these women resulting to the revivalists being accused of promiscuity.

The developing social ethics were disturbing. Both sexes were encouraged to sleep together simply because they were saved. The statement used was, “To the pure all things are pure” (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:30), a quite deceiving statement because some got into an immoral sexual relationship. The teaching of Noo preceded a sequence of other nefarious practices in the name of revival.

In 1946 Welbourn and Ogot (1966:31) observe Bildad Kaggia deserted the Anglican Church and formed a non-denominational church – The Voice of the World Wide Salvation and Healing Revival – which was registered in 1955. His followers in Central Nyanza, Jokaggia (Followers of Kaggia) began to preach Kaggiaism in 1948 emphasizing confession of sins, speaking in tongues and spiritual healing. They also refused the Anglican Prayer Book and parts of the Bible that deal with Jewish customs and practices. Eventually, Kaggians broke with Noo when the former demanded the latter to confess his sins leading to three factions, namely Noo, the Stanway and the Kaggians, all claiming to be revivalists.

On one pendulum, these disturbances destabilized the Anglican Church in Nyanza. Thus, Welbourn and Ogot (1966:32) note that the revivalists had to seek advice from their Ugandan counterparts to remain in the church and to place emphasis on conversion and confession of sins. This spelled doom for Noo and Kaggia, giving a lifeline to the Nyanza Revival. Noo formed his own church 1948 called The Christian Universal Evangelical Union which he headed until his death in 1960. With the departure of the Nooi62 faction from the Anglican Church, a group of Revivalist known as Joremo62 was left in the church (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:32).

62 A Luo word meaning people of blood; they sung and preached salvation through the blood of Christ.
On the other pendulum, the Revival Fellowship faced tribulations, particularly from the mainstream churches. Mambo (1973:111-112) avers that “church leaders predominantly reviled the Brethren's open confession of sin and their constant claim to have been born again.” On top of that, some looking for a Luo word for fellowship, unfortunately, chose lalruok, a word translated as ganging together of thieves conspiring to commit a robbery. They were thus referred to as that gang. The Gikuyu suffered a similar fate in their description of the Christian experience of rebirth in Christ. They were accused of reintroducing their traditional rite of guciaruo ringi (second birth). At the same time, the Fellowship was despised and termed as Dini ya Ruanda or Ruanda heresy. They were denied meetings in church buildings resulting in meeting in unusual places.

After the Second World War, Mambo (1973:112) notes a steady growth in the Revival Fellowship in Kenya exemplified by the rise of big conventions. This is echoed by Langley and Kiggins (1974:198) who record a major convention in Kikuyu land at Kahuhiia in 1947 followed by others at Kigari in Embu in 1948, Kabete in 1949 and Thogoto in 1950 where attendance was coming close to 20,000. Certainly, Gathogo (2016:7-8) observes that the ensuing conventions exposed their leaders’ lack of theological training, developing a legalistic lifestyle and sometimes making ignorant decisions. Nevertheless, their influence was bountiful, as former criminals’ and renegades particularly during the Mau-Mau rebellion confessed and denounced their past sins. Some of these confessions were disastrous and embarrassing. For instance, Bishop Peter Mwang’ombe of the Anglican Diocese of Mombasa lost his bishopric when a lady in 1970 publicly confessed that he had fathered her son when he was just a Reverend (Gitari, 2014:74).

3.2.2.6 Revival 1950 – 1980

Welbourn and Ogot (1966:33) open the second part of this brief survey with a big question, “was the revival to be conducted within or without the church?” - Already Nooism had severed its relationship with the Anglican Church, and the remaining wing of the revival felt disillusioned by the Anglican Church hierarchy. Consequently, the laity felt a need for spiritual separation from the mainstream church leading to the Kuhama movement whose members were called, Separatists, Wahamaji (vacating) or Joremo. The separation took place in 1953 in what Welbourn and Ogot (1963:33, 34) likened to Abraham living away from the land of his birth; they felt they had been called by God to leave the church, and everything behind, to devote themselves to a devotional life away from the powers of darkness exemplified by admission into their fellowship, those who were not walking in the light. They had been aggrieved by The Wahamaji\(^6^4\), who chose to defy the church on some key elements\(^6^5\) were the majority of the Revivalists and believed to be God’s elect and carried their cross daily (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:34-35).

Thus, Baur (1994:487) credits the Revival Movement for giving life to the Anglican Church. Nevertheless, Welbourn and Ogot (1966:36) observe that the majority of the church leaders decided to fight Kuhama who were accused of spiritual pride. Maseno was chosen as the headquarters for the rival group that had the support of the Rural Dean, the Rev. Festo Olang’, Archdeacon of Nyanza, E.K. Stovold and was believed to have had received blessings of the Bishop of Mombasa, Leonard Beecher (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:36).

3.2.2.7 Controversy between Joremo (Raba) and Johera (Maseno) Groups

By 1953, the Anglican Church in Nyanza had been split into two rival groups, a large one under lay leadership and the other under church leadership with a sizeable group of Christians expressing disaffection with the situation (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:36).

The Maseno group, argues Welbourn and Ogot (1966:37), believed the pure revivalism should remain in the church and supported it fully because Christians can only separate from the sin and not from Christ’s body, the church. Further, unlike the Wahamaji, the Maseno group encouraged lay leaders to support the leadership of the ordained ministers and based their stand on love (Luo, Johera) meaning those who love as espoused in John 23:34f, John 4:16 and Rev. 2:2ff (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:37). Doctrinally, Wahamaji (Joremo) believed people are saved through repentance and confession of sin and that one can be saved many times because we are still under the dominion of sin. Johera affirmed that salvation is through faith in Christ (Hebrews 11:1-12) and taught that salvation of the soul takes place once, though they acknowledge backsliding and restoration through repentance. Johera believed they are saved from the power and dominion of sin and thus are righteous and holy (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:38).

\(^6^4\) Musa Amoke, a layman emerged as the leader of Wahamaji (Joremo) and he ordained ministers.

\(^6^5\) They emphasized extempore prayers and not a fixed church liturgy; preferred Christ as the only recognized leader and not episcopacy; church leaders perceived not to walk in the light were referred to as worldly; opposed to being church teachers because it involves teaching sinners, collecting church monies and working with teachers who had not seen the light; against serving on church councils, committees or boards and could not be god-parents or best-men to non-separatists – these are things of the world; opposed to wearing of cassocks or wedding rings; no free choice of spouse, this was work of the movement; refused to recognize social obligations of non-religious nature like registering as voters and were engrossed with personal salvation to an extent of neglecting family responsibilities.
Welbourn and Ogot (1966:38) further note that the main difference between the Ramba (Joremo) and the Maseno (Johera) groups was on the conceptualization of the doctrine of salvation. Whereas Joremo believed in the inner light and the invisible Church, thus mistrusting the intellectuals, but upholding charismatic leadership and contentment for living for Christ, Johera believed in the visible church (Christ's body) and respected church authority, tradition and reason as a way of bringing necessary changes in the church (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:38).

The two rivals clashed in 1955 following the elevation of Olang’ to the position of the Assistant Bishop of Mombasa. Johera group believed he was tribal and would discriminate against the Luo. Olang’ aligned himself to Wahamaji who had now agreed to return to the institutional church (Ogot, 1966:40, 41). However, Olang’s move to join Joremo annoyed the Johera clergy who could not accept laymen to have authority over clergy (Ogot, 1966:42).

In 1956, Rev Abednego Matthew Ajuoga the leader of the Maseno group defied orders from the mainstream church leadership and wrote a complaint letter to the Bishop of Mombasa over the disciplinary action against a member of the clergy who was sympathetic to Johera group (Ogot, 1966:43). Ajuoga’s letter led to the reinstating of Rev Nathan Sila Awour but made reconciliation between the Maseno group and the church leaders in Nyanza difficult (Ogot, 1966:44). He again challenged the church leadership in a letter named Light addressed to the bishop of Mombasa upon which he was demoted and transferred to Bondo, a stronghold of Joremo (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:52).

In March 1957, Olang’ invited the Bishop of Mombasa to a meeting at Maseno to try to unite the two factions. The Bishop urged the warring groups to reconcile against the wishes of Olang’, who wished the Maseno group to join the Ramba group. Another meeting was called in May 1957, this time the Bishop agreed to his Assistant bishop’s wish and reprimanded Johera leaders to stop “preaching their nonsense” (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:53). Eventually, Ajuoga and his lieutenants’ licenses were withdrawn by the Bishop of Mombasa and the schism was inevitable (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:55). The tragic outcome of the Anglican Church in Maseno observes Baur (1994:482) was the rivalry not only between the two factions but also of the two churchmen in the name of Bishop Festo Olang’ and Rural Dean Matthew Ajuoga. In 1958, Ajuoga was eventually elected bishop of the Church of Christ through Presbyteral Ordination, because the Archbishop of Canterbury declined their ordination (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966: 57).

3.2.2.8 Revival through the years of Political independence

In the midst of the on-going intrigues in the spread of EARM, excitement of freedom led to some members of the Revival to join political parties. This brought new challenges as African Christians were motivated to demand independence from the mission churches. Thus, a dispute ensued between leaders of African churches and the mainstream churches. The revival’s practice of walking in repentance and the fullness of the Spirit was put to the test.

The Revivalists hated tribal differences, denominationalism, class society and political alignment. As a result, many, particularly Gikuyus, were persecuted by the colonial settlers. Consequently, Baur (1994:480) refers to the Revivalists as defenders of Christian non-violence who died a martyr's death for their Christian faith. They were accused of non-involvement in public issues and their concern for personal salvation. Gatu (2012:39) argues that during the state of emergency in Kenya (1952-1960) revival Brethren refused to align with any side of the political divide and declined to take the oath of allegiance. They argued that since they had been washed with the blood of Christ, they have no business with the blood of goats. They had to pay dearly with their blood. In fact, Gatu (2012:39), and Kiggins and Langley (1974:202) state that renewed oathing of 1969 saw many Brethren tortured or killed. Kiggins and Langley (1974:203) further assert that the Anglican Diocese of Mt Kenya was the first to host an anti-oathing rally attended by 50,000 people while still pledging loyalty to President Kenyatta and his government.

During this time there was a robust and acrimonious suspicion between the loyalists and supporters of the freedom fighters. The Revivalists' call for peaceful co-existence was echoed by the First President of Kenya, Mzee Jomo Kenyatta in 1963 when he startled both his foes and friends. Instead of retaliation, his call to the young nation was, “forgive and forget” and “love your neighbour as yourself” (Baur, 1994:481). He thus exemplified his strong revival heritage of preaching love. Perhaps being a friend of Bishop Obadiah Kariuki who was one of the leaders of the movement must have impacted Kenyatta at this time. Thus, revivalists influence was overwhelming; none could have resisted it within and outside the ecclesia. Their efforts in this respect helped in keeping bloody confrontation at bay after independence. Thus, many churches in Kenya united in revival following the suffering under the Mau Mau uprising and the painful struggle for independence.

On the flip-side, the revival fellowships did not need independence from any mission board or denomination because they were not attached to any formal organization. They handled their affairs including money generated from the fellowship separately as they planned mission or convention. They just walked in the light about finances. Don Jacobs, recalling the years he had worked closely in the ministries of fellowship that he never heard any accusation of misuse of finance (MacMaster & Jacobs, 2006:181).

However, Brethren in Kenya developed an internal mechanism of handling money in the name of Mtuko ya Bwana (The Lord’s Bag) into which Brethren would contribute to meet the needs of the Fellowship according to his ability (Mambo, 1973:115). This money, however, brought serious repercussions because the Brethren did not approve accounting and auditing procedures as they believed in walking in the light, accountability was not necessary for they trusted each other (Mambo, 1973:115).

Thus, beginning from 1964, Brethren were opposed to financial procedures and formed new movements within the revival referred to as Utufuo or Kufufuka (Resurrection) or Kuamka (Awakening) in Kenya and Uganda, and Okuzuzuka (Awakening) based on Ephesians 5:14-15. Mambo (1973:115) further notes that Awakened Brethren saw the evils caused by money like extravagant lifestyle, ruinous loans and thirst for prosperity.

Indeed, Gathogo (2016:7) contends that re-awakened Brethren were discouraged from taking bank loans because Jesus could come at night and would find some in debts, yet he paid debts through the cross. They were also not required to keep dogs for protection in their compounds, nor Securicor Officers among other security measures as God protects Balokole. As in the case of St. Paul, to “live is Christ and to die is gain” (Philippians 1:21). Gathogo (2016:8) further claims that the Arahuka (meaning, Arise) revival of 1967, saw masses of people from the mainline churches converted to this faith. He asserts that Ephesians 5:14 powerfully taught liberation from hypocrisy and all sorts of darkness. Gathogo (2016:8) observes that to some extent, it was surprising to hear confessions of cheating spouses (some church elders) despite hitherto appearing trustworthy. Thus, the 1970s came to be referred to as the generation of being born again.

The interpretation and application of the Ephesian text led to sustained controversy in the ensuing years. Kufufuka and Kusimama held their meetings separately at St Stephen’s Church, Nairobi on the first Sunday and the second Sunday of each month, respectively. Likewise in the Mount Kenya region, Kufufuka and Kusimama held their monthly meetings at Maragua and Murang’a cathedral, respectively (Gitari, n.d:5).

3.2.2.9 Events of 1980 – 2015

The third epoch portrays a stabilized situation though Kusimama (Stand) and Kufufuka (Awakened) continues to meet separately particularly at national and regional levels. Local meetings have seen them mingle and one may not notice their differences. However, the Stand group which claims to be the original EARM has majority members across the four selected counties. Some of the traits of this period depict a continuity of the past as shown.
3.2.2.9.1 Conventions resilience

In 1875, the first Convention was held at Keswick by the teachers of Higher Life and had continued in this Lake District to date. On African soil too, it has taken a journey of resilience since 1935 East African Convention at Kabale, Uganda (Mutembei, 2012:7) and has gone on unabated for about eighty years. Mutembei (2012:38) further observes the unbroken sequence of the Conventions by dates, places, and themes all the way from 1935 to 2007, but notes that it was only 1997 and 2007 when there were no conventions.

The Kabale convention met for a full week, Sunday to Sunday (Church, 1986:116-117), an updated version of early Keswick which met for five days (Naselli, 2010:171). The recent Kabale Convention in Uganda which had a theme: “Brethren, consider your call” (1 Cor.1:26), shows a thinned timeline of three days (20th-23rd August 2015). But they still covered five topics as it were with Keswick. Keswick’s first day dealt with sin and the final day with a mission. The Kabale Convention shows a paradigm shift from specific topics to generalized ones, whereby the first day was on revitalizing the spirit of revival and the final day was on evangelism and discipleship. They seem to have adopted the characteristics of the modern Keswick convention, fondly called Keswick Ministries (Naselli, 2010:140). Truly the approach may have shifted, but the focus has remained, albeit with a wider spectrum.

3.2.2.9.2 Mfuko wa Bwana (The Lord’s Bag)

The Lord’s Bag was mentioned in the second phase of this survey and seems to have been practiced in Kenya ever since. In the late 1990s, Kamau (2001:28) highlights a controversy within the Stand group associated with the Mfuko wa Bwana. The district team had prepared an exaggerated budget for the Kirinyaga Convention in the Mount Kenya Region. The matter went up to the Diocesan Bishop for mediation, resulting in a smaller budget which managed the convention activities raising questions what the Brethren wanted to do with the rest of the money. However, the damage was already done leading to a split within the Stand, but the wound has healed. Perhaps the Kenyan team needs to learn from the Tanzanian counterpart which opened a bank account to handle revival’s financial transactions (Mambo, 1974:115). Thus, they avoided trusting money to a few individuals under the guise that they will walk in the light.

3.2.2.9.3 Generation Gap

Strict legalistic behaviour associated with Brethren like “do not drink; do not smoke; do not part your hair; do not wear short skirts” (Langley and Kiggins, 1974:2002) alienated many admirers. Thus, particularly the young people have not been attracted to EARM because of these stringent social ethics. However, there have been attempts to bring young people into the revival as attested by the recent big gathering of youth at Lenana School Convention for young Brethren. The theme of the Convention had been taken from Ephesian 5:1 “Be imitators of God as dearly beloved children” (Lenana School Document-Kenya, 4th – 7th August 2011).

3.2.2.9.4 GAFCON Communiqué

The Global Anglican Future Conference (GAFCON) meeting at All Saints Cathedral, Nairobi in October 2013 found solace and inspiration from the EARM’s theology of salvation. They noted the revival had touched millions of lives as the Holy Spirit moved Christians from the beginning of the last century, to share the good news of Christ with others. They identified three features consonance with EARM:

- In the East African Revival, people learn about a change of heart.
- That repentance of sin is followed by a confession of guilt and a desire to make amends.
- That the gospel’s power is two-fold; to save the lost and transform the church as opposed to church conforming to the world.

The meeting repented of indifference, prayerlessness, and inactivity in the face of false teaching. They affirmed that the sins from which they must repent are not necessarily those which the world also believes are wrong; they are those that God himself abhors and which is made clear in his Word66. The conviction of sin was noted by Dr. Senyonyi of Uganda Christian University to be central to revival (Walton, 2013:2).

While the GAFCON 2013 was centred on the conviction of sin, the GAFCON Nairobi communiqué 2016 concentrated on unity. Members expressed a desire to walk together in spite of the geographical distance between them. The phrase to walk together sounds alarm bells from the perspective of beliefs and practices of EARM. It seems to resonate with the spirit of revival’s dictum of walking in the light. That is, the spirit of repentance and ‘walking in the light, as he is in the light’ (1 John 1:7–9). Indeed, the fact that six out of ten of the provinces67 in the communiqué 2016 were from Eastern Africa indicates the dynamics and influence of EARM on the GAFCON. Indeed, the outgoing Chairman of the GAFCON, the Most Rev’d Dr. Eliud Wabukala of the Anglican Church of Kenya has been a keen member of the EARM. Having said that, the meeting seems to regret the distance attributed to The Episcopal Church walking away from the Anglican Communion’s doctrine on sexuality and the plain teaching of Scripture.

3.2.3 EARM’s heritage of Keswick theology

Having established some legacy of EARM from Keswick theology, it is prudent to identify some theological underpinnings of EARM, which was apparent in the historical survey of Anglican Church scholarship. These foundations could have prompted beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

Naselli (2010:74), an early Keswick theology scholar and critic, believes this theology is erroneous and dangerous in spite of its being within the confines of evangelical orthodoxy. Naselli (2010:27) concedes that his college days were permeated with the saved and surrender mantra in the sense of “I was saved at 13 and surrendered my life to the Lord at 18 years”. The second step (surrendered life) has been what Naselli (2010:28) came to call “Let go and let God.” Naselli concedes that he got disillusioned and wondered whether the teaching was biblical because it wasn’t in line with what he was reading in the Bible (Naselli, 2010:27).

Naselli (2010:200,202) seems to suggest that the let go and let God concept is not supported by the Scriptures. He argues that the “Let go” perception in the life of a believer was thought to occur when one surrenders everything to God, including himself. The part of the believer henceforth was to “praise God for victory” and “not to pray for victory.” The “let God” notion leads to quietism or passivism, because of believing that God’s grace is sufficient to meet all needs. The Rom 8:2 “God has set us wholly free from the law of sin,” has been misinterpreted to mean—“not will do this, but has already done it.” In other words, no need to struggle, just surrender all (let go) and rest in faith (let God).

About this scenario, Guillebaud (2002:57) observes a peculiar situation in Uganda, which could be translated as “let go and let God.” While sleeping on a makeshift bed, Blasio Kigozi had this to say when two boys woke him up because they had spotted a leopard:

“Would you be frightened if there was a soldier here with a gun?” “No.” “Well, we have better than a soldier. Jesus Christ is our protection. Go back to sleep.” While no religious person would ignore that God protects his people, Kigozi demonstrates the kind of Christian faith prevailing among the revivalists. Years later in Kenya, the reawakened brethren would not keep security dogs because Jesus protects them.

In respect to saved and surrender concepts in Kenya, the former refers to the converted in the sense of the Spirit baptism. The latter refers to the filling of the Spirit that accompanies victorious life in the sense of a daily walk in the light and attending fellowship meetings. The Brethren likens a truly saved person to a piece of a carrot, uprooted, shaken all the soil and any dust dangling on it. This seems to parallel early Keswick theology experience of victorious life on one hand, and Brethren’s victory at the cross of Christ on the other. It seems true that a significant element of the early Keswick theology could still be traced in EARM.

Indeed, the Anglican scholars and associates have written substantially on the socio-ethical beliefs and practices which could have contributed towards the concept of walking in light in the EARM. However, little has been said concerning its relationship with Keswick theology in spite of the fact that the pioneers of revival had Keswick theology undertones. For instance, Dr. Church was influenced by the Keswick theology flourishing in the CICCUC that emphasized the post-conversion experience of a second blessing, or “Spirit-filling,” and a strong desire for the higher Christian life (Church, 1931:18). Indeed, Dr. Church, during his early years in Ruanda, believed that Africans could also experience a second blessing (1931:18).

Besides, in the early days, there were Keswick Conventions in East Africa and could have had a significant impact on the East African Conventions. The answer to this anomaly could be two-fold. Firstly, the Keswick teachings could have found fertile ground in the East African soil as discussed in chapter 2. Thus, Africans could have easily appropriated the teachings into their traditional cultural milieu to the extent that Keswick theology could have lost its original edge.

Secondly, the general wave of classical Evangelical revivalism of the late 19th century that came to East Africa, courtesy of CMS Ruanda Mission, could also have claimed parenthood for the revival. This is because Ruanda Mission emphasized conservative Evangelical views on the Bible (Ward, 2006:176) and “promoted urgent quest for renewal of personal holiness as understood by the Keswick movement” (Ward, 2012:3). In other words, as claimed by Ward (2006:175) the two views point to Keswick’s seed and are thus authentic.

Hastings (1979:52) summarizes the two views. Whereas the East African revival exhibited characteristics of global classical Protestantism revival drawn from Keswick Conventions and the Buchman’s Oxford Group, it nevertheless acquired a unique African face. Therefore, the question of the influence of Keswick theology on EARM’s walking in the light deserves interrogation. This section, therefore, strives to discuss six key elements that constitute experiential sanctification or practical holiness in EARM largely informed by the Keswick teachings. Some elements like a baptism of the Spirit and born again are closely related but will.

be discussed separately to understand the perspectives of Keswick/EARM on either one of them. Also, note that the second blessing concept runs through some of these elements, implying its significance in the history of the Keswick movement.

3.2.3.1 Baptism of the Spirit, a second blessing?

Barabas (1952:131) argues that Keswick’s view of the baptism of the Spirit is not a spiritual experience after regeneration but a primary blessing of regeneration or what could be referred to as born again. This negates some early Christian teachings (the higher life) that the baptism of the Spirit is a spiritual experience subsequent to regeneration, which they refer to as a second blessing, which was to be received as was on the day of Pentecost. This resonates with Naselli’s (2010:138,234) argument that Spirit-baptism like justification is Christ’s judicial, positional, non-experiential gift and occurs at regeneration and never occurs again (1 Cor. 12:13). At the moment of accepting Christ, a person receives the baptism of the Spirit. That means all Christians are Spirit-baptized at regeneration and since they cannot experience a second Spirit-baptism, argues Naselli (2010:234) they should not try to find it. This is because the Spirit-baptism is an endowment for those forming Christ’s body, the church and believers have no part to play. It’s within the church that sanctification of believers is manifested.

In a bid to describe the believer’s lifetime fight with sin in retrospect to the struggle between the believer’s old and new man, that is flesh and spirit, Naselli (2010:272) rightly cites Galatians 5:16–26. Thus, there is no second blessing apart from God’s work in the believer at conversion, which is judicial and ushers a Christian into the spirit-flesh tussles while in this world. Unfortunately experiential sanctification or what some believers call Spirit-filling experiences seems to have elevated the saved ones/Balokol70 to a higher status of holiness than the ordinary Christians. The saved/Brethren are believed to walk in the light, whereas those outside the Brethren circle, even though they have received Spirit-baptism, were regarded as not born again.

Then, it is wondered whether EARM advocated for the second blessing theology. Dr. Church’s assertion is in the affirmative (Church, 1931:18). He further claims that second blessing is a spirituality that portrays a deeper holiness and continuous surrender which came to be known by the Cambridge Christian Union in the 1920s as the victorious life or the Highest (Church, 1981:14). Macmaster and Jacobs (2006:28) concurs and asserts that Dr. Church witnessed to Nisimbabi about filling of the Spirit and the victorious life. It is true then that some of the early revivalists propagated a second blessing theology. But some scholars were pessimistic.

70 Kenyan revivalists are referred to as Brethren or Wandugu wa mizigo (burden carriers in respect to bearing other Christians’ burden/problems, and particularly among the Brethren).
Ward (2012:4) states that whereas Keswick movement taught the second blessing after initial conversion, EARM emphasized brokenness at the cross of Christ. Ward (2012:4) stated that “previous Christian experience apart from this event [initial conversion] was not recognized by the revivalists as kulokoka – the state of being saved.” But brokenness/kulokoka ought to be an experience subsequent to initial conversion, although ways of presentation may differ from that of the second blessing. Thus, the born-again element among the Brethren ought to occur consequent to initial conversion.

If this is the case, there might have been a change from second blessing emphasis. Indeed it seems like this experience had begun to lose its sting (in Britain) even before the end of the 19th century and had gradually been replaced by an emphasis on activism and dedication to the cause of Christ and mission (Reed, 2007:56). However, its possible resilience had a significant impact on the African soil. Honestly, as stated by Dr. Church above, it seems to some extent to have defined East African spirituality.

However, the early Keswick’s emphasis on the second blessing received severe criticism from the renowned England Evangelical Bishop, J.C. Ryle through his writings on holiness and practical religion (Reed, 2007:56). The form of early Keswick theology that influenced EARM to a larger extent would be said to be partially a modified form of the higher life teachings, which had originated from America, courtesy of Robert Pearsall Smith and his wife, Hannah Whitehall Smith. Its partial modification through Ryle’s work (Reed, 2007:56-57) was a welcome gesture that shaped the Evangelical teaching up to the mid-20th century when again it met with criticism from the Evangelical cycles.

Thus, the baptism of the Spirit isn’t the same as a second blessing. In fact, the second blessing would make sense when paralleled to the filling of the Spirit which will be discussed later. Baptism of the Spirit as argued by Naselli (2008:39) is not only judicial and theologically valid but also Scriptural (Luke 3:16). Indeed, the most likely reason why Bishop Ryle condemned Keswick theology was probably its misappropriation of the baptism of the Spirit to the second blessing, which lacks sound biblical and theological support (Reed, 2007:56). Certainly, the evidence found in the scripture, concerning the baptism of the Spirit, has been the immediate commencement of the new life in Christ, akin to what some would call the born-again experiences.

3.2.3.2 Born again

Undeniably, the outcome of Yosiya rendezvous with Nisimbabi would link born-again and conversion experience. Dr. Church (1981:79) accounts Yosiya’s born-again crisis, “In the motor lorry on the road back to Gahini I kept pondering over these things, and before I got back, I was deeply convicted. My sins became a burden upon my back, and I yielded to Christ…. this new life that began in me has never left me, and I am always longing to excel more in it” (Church, 1981:79). In the words of Naselli (2010:27), he became saved and then followed a new lifestyle. This kind of conversion appears to be different from the initial conversion after justification/baptism of the Spirit. Though the theological question here is whether he had been converted before his baptism. Dr. Church refused to have his child baptized in Uganda because he did not like Roman Catholic teaching that baptism ex opera operato saved a child, i.e., by the act performed. He went on to claim that Uganda was full of baptized heathens. His son was thus baptized in England by its grandfather in “a private family baptism service, modifying the prayer book stress on the phrase, ‘seeing now… this child is regenerate’” (Church, 1981:80). The confusion surrounding application of this sacrament requires a brief unpacking. In his online article71, David Pratte (2006) argues that,

“If the man doing the baptism needed some particular qualifications in order for baptism to be valid, then we would likewise need to be sure that he, in turn, had been baptized by one who had the proper qualifications. In this way, we would need to somehow trace the qualifications of people who did the baptizing back through history to make sure they all had the proper qualifications. If anyone in the chain was not properly qualified to do a baptism, but they did it anyway, then the person they baptized would not be saved. Then anyone that person baptized would not be saved, etc. So we would need to know that the person who baptized us was baptized by someone who had the proper qualifications, etc., back through history. This would seem to make it almost impossible to know if our baptism was valid. Such a tracing of qualifications is unnecessary, however, because the validity of the baptism depends on what is done, not on the character or spiritual standing of the man who does the baptism.”

Pratte’s sentiments underscore the significance of the baptismal sacrament, in that; it belongs to God and not to the officiating minister. Furthermore, the relegation of this sacrament to a supposedly holy church minister in a convenient context does not seem to add more value to its efficacy, than when administered by apparently an unacceptable priest, in an unsuitable environment.

Nevertheless, baptism is a significant rite for a Christian’s salvation journey. It, therefore, should not only be done scripturally but also the person bestowed with this ceremony ought to be beyond reproach (1 Tim. 3:1-4). Thus the phrase this child is regenerate (Church, 1981:80), could serve to further the argument that the baptismal rite as an outward sign of the inward grace, ought to commence a Christian’s life/born-again lifestyle.

In retrospect, Keswick theology invoked a second blessing experience as a phenomenon following initial conversion which signified Keswick spirituality of Christian undergraduates of the 1920s. Dr. Church (1981:14) argues that these undergraduates were seeking for deeper holiness, a second blessing or what was referred to by CICCU as victorious life. This was the spirituality that Dr. Church (1981:15) strived to see realized not only in himself but in Uganda and Ruanda. At this juncture, Dr. Church was still under the immense influence of the early Keswick theology. Thus, one could understand why he had to struggle to get a holy person to baptize his child.

So, the concept born again/twice-born and second blessing is significant in the sense that they seem to be a second stage in the salvation process in the EARM and the Keswick theology, respectively. However, the meaning of the terms seems to vary due to changed circumstances as discussed earlier. It seems correct to assume that the controversy brought about by the second blessing was replaced by stress on devotion to serving Christ (Reed, 2007:56) which has been expressed through various terminologies like saved ones. Thus, the phrase twice-born/saved ones seemed to have gradually evolved from previous second blessing theology to become the trademarks of Balokole (Bruner, 2012:267)72. The other profound characteristics of the Balokole have been the centrality of the Cross. Brokenness at the Cross ought to be a due and instantaneous response following the initial conversion.

3.2.3.3 The Cross of Christ – daily victory

Senyonyi (2013:4) observes that revivalists like Nagenda saw Jesus as the focus of the Revival meetings. Indeed, the name Jesus and the Cross were used interchangeably. Mambo (1973:116) further notes that Brethren strongly “emphasize daily spiritual deliverance, cleansing, and power for Christian living, through the blood of Jesus which was shed on the Cross”. Certainly, the central symbols that stand out in the mind of the Brethren are the crucifixion of Jesus on the cross and the shed blood.

Surely, revival meetings would not have realized its goal without invoking the blood of Jesus for the forgiveness of sin. Dr. Church and his fellow evangelists were said to preach the message of brokenness, the message of the Cross, i.e., Christ crucified. At one incident, the overwhelming sense of guilt led government and even respected church leaders to seek “the cleansing blood of Jesus Christ” (MacMaster & Jacobs, 2006:40, 41). At Gahini school, Guillebaud (2002:66) records a weird incident as girls met with Jesus: “One girl was kneeling apparently in a trance with tears running down her face, crying out, ‘can’t you see him – look, there – Jesus is on the cross, dying for me.’ Indeed the convicting presence of Christ saw many remorseful souls seeking his cleansing. This is consistent with Osborn (2000:87) who observed that the Brethren contend that the Holy Spirit leads believers back to the Cross, to Christ’s cleansing blood.

72 Bruner cited this reference, “[Activities of the “Abalokole”, “Twice Born” or “Saved Ones”’, 30 April 1944, TNA CO 536/215/4, f. 9, p. 9]. This reference was extracted from a letter, probably intercepted by the Protectorate Government, seemingly from a female British teacher.”

Unlike the early Keswick movement, which stressed a second blessing experience beyond initial conversion, Ward & Wild-Wood (2010:14) assert that the East African Revival focused more on the initial conversion as “an overwhelming experience of brokenness at the cross”. This assertion leads to difficulties because while there were some who experienced brokenness immediately after initial conversion (Spirit-baptism), others had this experience later in life.

Indeed, Meg Guillebaud (2006:66) alludes to a revival at Mukono Anglican Training College led by Joe Church in which many people responded to Christ. However, some members of staff were unhappy that the “message was unsettling their baptized and confirmed students.” Thus, it looks like there are two classes of conversion. Firstly, at baptism after initial conversion, i.e., becoming a Christian and secondly, when one is converted to a new way of expressing brokenness at the cross as per the overwhelming power of the Holy Spirit. Indeed the two sets of conversion are prevalent among Christians in the present day Protestant mainstream churches in Kenya. Many converted believers of the first category would not be considered Brethren unless by their daily lives they exhibit brokenness.

This being the case, there seems some semblance of Keswick and EARM teachings concerning the two types of Christians. That is the born again, by virtue of experiencing brokenness. The one group is said not to have been born again and yet have been baptized, simply because they could not express brokenness by constant confession of their sin.

3.2.3.4 Public confession of sin

Anne Coomes (1990:68-69) details the events of 1935 that led to the conversion of Festo Kivengere following a convention at Kabale, Uganda in which Dr. Joe Church was the main speaker. The convention had run from - Sunday 22nd to Monday 30th September 1935 – and kept to one theme per day with sin occupying the first slot on Tuesday73. As a result, Coomes (1990:69) observes a wave of conviction across Kabale as people wept for their sins and sought repentance and forgiveness. This led to restitution (translated in Gikuyu as guthondeka mehia).

73 Other themes were: repentance, Wednesday; the new birth, Thursday; coming out of Egypt (separation from the world), Friday; the Holy Spirit and the Victorious life, Saturday; praise Meeting, Sunday.
So, when Festo Kivengere gave his life to Jesus Christ, the natural consequence was to confess publicly his sins of smoking, drinking and stealing. This also meant leaving behind cultural taboos like eating chicken, eggs, and fish, which a Muhima (Festo’s tribe) should not touch. Such denials constituted his new talent as he openly shared his faith in Christ (Coomes, 1990:72-73).

The nagging question here is how he came to acquire knowledge of confession. Was it from Dr. Church, a beneficiary of Keswick theology? Or, was it a natural order following the dictums of the African traditional culture that compels a wrongdoer to confess the wrongs publicly?

Keswick theology shows that the sin principle has been a key subject at Keswick meetings since 1875. Indeed, the entire Keswick week appeared to focus its attention on sin, other topics were hinged on it.

Although Ward (2012:4) insinuates that Dr. Church had been influenced by Frank Buchman’s Oxford Group Movement that emphasized public confession of sin, it seems unlikely that Buchman didn’t have a Keswick heritage. An AA Pamphlet for Agnostics74 posted on November 3, 2013, notes Buchman’s confession of his prideful behaviour at 1908 Keswick Convention in England. The full text of his confession after the preaching of Jessie Penn-Lewis is below.

“I thought of those six men back in Philadelphia who I felt had wronged me. They probably had, but I got so mixed in the wrong that I was the seventh wrong man… I can only tell you I sat there and realized how my sin, my pride, my selfishness and my ill-will had eclipsed me from God in Christ. I was the centre of my own life. That big “I” had to be crossed out. I saw my resentments against those men standing out like tombstones in my heart. I asked God to change me, and He told me to put things right with them. It produced in me a vibrant feeling, as though a strong current of life had suddenly been poured into me, and afterward a dazed sense of a great spiritual shaking up.”

Certainly, this is brokenness at best, in a Keswick Convention context in which Buchman was convicted of his sins. Since it was a Keswick teaching that brought him to his knees it gives credit to Keswick theology and Dr. Church’s religious heritage. Indeed, even Hooper (2007:82) concurs that from its foundation, the East African revival had been impacted by the teachings of the Keswick movement. As the teachings entered the mission churches, the brethren attested to the cleansing power of the Blood of the Lamb and confessed sin publicly (1John 1:7).

Therefore, it seems fair to suggest that in spite of some of the Keswick’s questionable teachings; at least public confession was Keswick distinctive. Indeed Pollock (1964:68,70)

contends that Handley Moule, a Principal of Ridley Hall at Cambridge beginning the years of 1881 and later Bishop of Durham, publicly confessed (blessing). Thus, it looks like a public confession at Keswick meetings were accepted phenomena. No doubt this practice could have gained leverage in the African context of vomiting/confessing evil or taboo.

Thus, perhaps Festo could have borrowed the art of public confession from his culture. Stanley (1977:14) acknowledges this feature among the Bahima (Festo’s tribe) of North-Eastern Ankole, a traditional religious practice in which, “the tutelary spirits were worshiped by local cult groups, entry into which was effected by an initiation ceremony where the initiate had to confess alleged infringements of sexual prohibitions. The initiate went through a ritual of being killed and being brought back to life before being accepted into the cult group”. This resonates with Gikuyu traditional religion and culture where the ceremony of gutahikio (symbolic vomiting) was administered to remove thahu (ritual defilement). In this ritual, the offender was called upon to confess his or her wrongs, known or unknown (Karaja, 2012:147-148). It thus looks like the art of confession has been rooted in various religious practices and has always been appropriated to serve the spiritual and psychological contexts of the client. However, this conclusion neither negates the influence of Keswick theology nor ignores the impacts of the African religious culture. One of the significant emphasis here has been the habit of public confession of the wrongs such as promiscuity. Although such public confessions have now been discouraged, they were regarded to be one of the key pointers that one has been born of the Spirit of God.

3.2.3.5 Filling of the Spirit

The Spirit-filled life was the climax of the teachings in the first three days; sin, cure, and consecration (Naselli, 2010:172) of the yearly Keswick Convention. The Spirit-filling was believed to be the key theme of the Keswick week. Indeed, it was considered “a great sin not to be filled with the Spirit” (Barabas, 1952:131). The Spirit-filled Christians are believed to have the enabling power of the Holy Spirit, to enable them to live a consistent Christian life. The choosing of the seven men “known to be full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom” (Acts 6:3) suggests a biblical thrust on this subject and more so for Christians who hold church offices. A further lesson from this text is that some people fell short of the fullness of the Spirit. This raises the question of equitability of the fullness of the Spirit among Christians. Again, this is a two case scenario between those who have fullness vs. those who have little or are lacking, and what that means for the church mission and ministry.

Barabas (1952:132) referring to Ephesians 5:18 contend that Keswick teaches that, “While every Christian has the Spirit and has been baptized by the Spirit, not every Christian is filled with the Spirit or has the fullness of the Spirit.” This resonates with Naselli (2010:206) but adds that “to have the Spirit is one thing, but to be filled with the Spirit is quite another”. He further refers to the question asked in Acts 19:2 “Did you receive the Holy Spirit when you believed?” This question suggests that one can be born of the Spirit and not be filled with the Spirit, i.e., not sanctified wholly. Naselli (2010:207) reiterates that Spirit-baptism occurs once at a believer’s crisis, while Spirit-filling frequents a believer’s lifetime.

Also, filling of the Spirit serves to equip a child of God (Murray, 1908:110) for holiness and service without which living a consistent Christian life would be difficult. Naselli (2010:205) notes the influence of Wesleyanism and Pentecostalism in the early Keswick theology brought to Keswick by the higher life teachings. The advocates of the early Keswick theology such as Hopkins used Spirit-filling and Spirit-baptism terminology interchangeably. It was not until around 1900s when Spirit-baptism terminology slowly came to be used for “what all believers experience at conversion and to reserve Spirit-filling terminology for what only some believers experience subsequent to conversion” (Naselli, 2010:205).

Dr. Church and Nsimbabi, reeling from the impact of the Protestant Evangelicalism, particularly Keswick influence found themselves reading extensively about the Holy Spirit from the Scofield Bible. Guillebaud75 (1959: 50) avers that “the Spirit Himself lit up the Book and they saw in a new way not only their sin and failure but the marvel and sufficiency of God’s remedy in Christ.” Meg Guillebaud (2002:56) adds that they knelt in prayer, “deciding before God to quit all sin in faith, and claiming the victorious life and the filling of the Holy Spirit”. It is likely that at this point, spirit filling and born again were viewed as both sides of the same coin. Yosiya’s countenance after yielding to Christ (Church, 1981:79) parallels Dr. Church and Nsimbabi’s experiences of quitting all sin and becoming Spirit-filled.

The element of filling of the Spirit, as opposed to Spirit baptism, could have started among the Balokole/Brethren around this time, in what has come to be referred to as born again. If this is the case, then the practice of Brethren repeating continuously their born again experiences seems to demonstrate the fact that, it was not an event but a process. Thus, Brethren were encouraged to walk daily with God in prayer and Bible study. While this was important for continuous spiritual discernment, some Brethren got puffed-up with their spiritual experiences as to regard others outside their Christian worldview as not saved/spirit-filled. Nsimbabi claimed to discern whether visiting missionaries had the real thing in their hearts (filling of the Spirit) through a shake of hands (Church, 1981:87). Thus, a holier than thou attitude started to manifest itself within the revivalists.

Nonetheless, Dr. Church and Nsimbabi, championed the spirit of brokenness at the cross of Christ, which became a signature for the fullness of the Spirit amongst the Brethren. While these findings were a significant breakthrough for the East African revival, they somewhat became divisive as had already been manifested with Nsimbabi’s obvious spiritual pride. In spite of this shortcoming, the Balokole had an unquestioning belief in the authority of the scripture.

3.2.3.6 Authority of the Scripture

Rodgers (2011:1) argues that “Anglicans have sought to build their theology on the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, with Jesus as the fulfillment, central climax and right perspective on the meaning of the whole of the Scripture.” Undeniably, the revivalists could not agree more with Rodgers. The pillar of the Brethren’s strength has been the Scripture. Dr. Church’s (1981:61, 62) observation puts this assertion into perspective. The Scofield Bible had been the main text with a series of Bible Study leading to the publication of ‘Every Man a Bible Student’. Thus “Bibles were used till they fell to pieces” (Church, 1981:114). Dr. Church and Nismbabi diligently used the Scripture leading to the duo claiming “the victorious life and filling of the Holy Spirit” (Guillebaud, 2006:56). Certainly, Revival teams used the Bible to teach related subjects per day, was reminiscent of Keswick Conventions. The topic of “sin, repentance, new birth, separation from the things of the world, the victorious life and the Holy Spirit” (Guillebaud, 2002:67) were Scriptural themes. At Gahini, Bible teaching, “a sword of the Holy Spirit” (Ephesians 6:17) was a daily business for hospital workers (Church, 1981:78, 87). As the leading teachers had little or no theological education, devotional reading of the Bible was bound to become the norm.

Dr. Church, a British medical doctor in Ruanda, had a meticulous leadership in the early East Africa revival. But there isn’t evidence that he attended a theological college except of course being a member of CICCU through which he came into contact with Keswick theology. A book popular in the CICCU at that time, ‘How to Live the Victorious Life’, had a profound influence on his religious conviction (Makower, 1999:27). This book argues Makower (1999:27), represented the Keswick theology of the post-conversion experience/a second blessing, or “Spirit-filling,” and a strong desire for the higher Christian life (Church, 2017: Online). Likewise, Nismbabi’s background, argues MacMaster and Jacobs (2006:28, 29) was medical in Uganda’s civil service.

With this shallow theological context, the proper biblical interpretation was a challenge. This could have been one of the causes of misunderstandings and splits over the years. The most profound division within the revival has been that of the Reawakened (Abazukufu) as a result of reading Ephesians 5:14, “Awake o sleeper and rise from the dead and Christ will shine upon you.” Those who always confess their sins after conversion were said to be dead because they had not experienced the power of the Spirit to overcome sin. The ordinary Balokole were considered dead (abafu). For Nsimbabi this was a key text, but in 1972 he turned against the Bazukufu, and this formalized the split between the Reawakened and the ordinary Balokole. Nowadays in Uganda, these antagonisms are not so hotly debated, and both groups flourish to some extent. In Kenya, the Abazukufu are known as Kufufuka (awakened/Arise) and the Abafu (Kusimama/Stand). However, their differences are felt more during large meetings/Conventions where each faction separately holds its own. For example, the recent convention for the Abafu, “the 8th Kabale Revival Convention” took place at Kabale, Uganda from 20th – 23rd August 2015. The Abazukufu held “the East African Reawakened Revival” in Uganda Sebei College, Tegers from 10th to 13th December 2015.

Reed (2006:58) notes the defect of Keswick teaching as due to lack of clear theological viewpoint. This has been blamed for a weak theological standing of Evangelicalism in the British Anglican Church in the early 20th century. However, it would be unfair to develop a view that devotional reading of the Bible is wrong in itself. In fact, it would be an added advantage for a biblical scholar who also uses scripture devotionally and prayerfully for his edification. Indeed, the church today has been forthright in encouraging informed Bible preaching and teaching as exemplified in the GAFCON Nairobi communiqué mission statement.

The previous six themes construed from the historical survey/overview of scholarly literature and documents bring to the fore the intricate genesis and spread of EARM to Kenya since 1935. These themes could be claimed to have been substantively impacted by the Keswick theology of sanctification, albeit with an African face. The inferred achieving of experiential sanctification has been argued to have led to the socio-ethical practice of walking in the light. So, the following section has been designed to conclude the perceived relationship between the said themes and the practice of walking in the light.

3.2.3.7 Consolidation of themes from the viewpoint of walking in the light (1 John 1:7)

Walking in the light is a central theme in this study. Giving it a section here is not meant for discussion because that has already been done in chapter 2. The aim is to glean and consolidate themes drawn from the influence of Keswick theology on EARM, which could have contributed to the prevailing situation in the Anglican Church of Kenya. These themes, namely; baptism of the Spirit, born again, Cross of Christ, public confession of sins, filling of the Spirit, and authority of the Scripture seem to define the socio-ethical concept of walking in the light.

78 The mission of GAFCON works to guard and proclaim the unchanging, transforming Gospel through biblically faithful preaching, teaching, and programmes which free our churches to make disciples by clear and certain witness to Jesus Christ in the entire world.
However, themes like the baptism of the Spirit and filling of the Spirit are no longer emphasized except in the Pentecostal churches and Charismatic groups within the mainstream churches. This to some extent could have weakened Brethren's identity in Kenya. These themes will certainly form the basis for discussion in the subsequent chapters, but firstly the findings from the field research will be considered.

3.3 NATURE AND CURRENT TRENDS REGARDING ANGLICAN CHURCH SCHOLARSHIP ON KESWICK THEOLOGY INFLUENCE ON EARM’S WALKING IN THE LIGHT: FINDINGS AND ANALYSES OF THE PREVAILING SITUATION.

3.3.1 Data construction

This section gives vivid responses to research questions as they were put to the respondents. Some answers were recorded verbatim while others, due to expansive information were diligently summarized to match the actual text, mostly in the third person. This was done across the categories of respondents for each of the interview questions. The answer to each research questions was collated in terms of comment or a note at the bottom end of each category. This was done in all the subsequent categories. Finally, these notations were put together to glean the most recurrent elements, which became themes or findings of this research.

Merriam (2009:178) calls this process of making appropriate notations of bits of data that looks potentially useful in answering the research questions as coding. This process is different from coding as a way of de-identifying sources of data, which also accompanied this analysis. Thus the interview centres and identifying personal information have been consequently de-identified. However, the original identifying draft will be made available should it be required. The procedure began with question one (1) through to question seven (7).

3.3.1.1 Describe the way you give a testimony

This question was answered by only the ordinary members and the leaders of the EARM because of their unique way of giving testimony which is not common among theologians. The research will start with sets of data of ordinary members. Each centre in every category has been de-identified as follows.

Kini: They begin with saying Tenderezza\(^79\) and what God has done in the sense of deliverance from sins.

Muri: starts with the full name, where they came from when one was born again. They also seek to know what prompted conviction whether it was the Word that was preached or a song that was sung. They complete their testimony with affirming their growth in Christ every hour.

Kigu: “I should say my name and place of residence. Where I was when I got saved. What I was saved from and to return what I had stolen. After that, I say what God has done in my life since I got saved. I finish with future expectations from God.”

Kama: Somebody starts with saying his name, then the date he met with Christ and sought Brethren to give his testimony. He realized his sin and corrected the sin by returning all acquired illegal properties. Then he realized forgiveness of Jesus, and he was cleansed of his sins. He then started following the Brethren way of life.

Bahlo: Someone starts by saying his name and his home place. Then the year of accepting Christ and that Jesus is Lord.

Diocese of Mt Kenya West

Caal: in giving testimony, they repent and confess in details all the sins they had committed before accepting salvation. Secondly, where it was necessary to repay what was stolen, they did so. Those who had avoided paying taxes go to the government officials to say he had not paid. Even if he had committed adultery he would go back to repent and guthondeka (make amends). He said he lives within the fellowship by repenting his sins. He mentions all the sins that he had previously committed.

Kaba: “I was born again on July 26, 1981. I don’t forget that day. Uria utakanyumbura guku ndikamumbura iguru (whoever will not acknowledge my name before men, I will not acknowledge him before my Father in heaven, Matt.10:33). I used to see the evil ways of other people’s lives, though were confessing Christ. I decided to witness so that Jesus will say he knows me”, Kiya: they start by indicating the full name, date of salvation in full and the text that led to salvation. They also give the light of their past dark practices and without hypocrisy.

\(^{79}\) Denotes praise God
Kagu: They start with mentioning where you come from, date of salvation, details of sins you got saved from, the progress of salvation by Jesus, future hope.

Kima: They start with Tukutenderezza because it is their universal greeting. They realized their sin and found the light.

Caal: What God has done in your life beginning with time you encountered God. Through testimony, one should ask God for forgiveness.

Kigi: The time and year you got saved. How it happened, was it as a result of hearing the word, dream or hearing other peoples’ testimony?

Kigi: They begin by saying their names, where they came from when they got saved (time, date, day, month and year) where they were and what they were doing. They confess their past sins one by one.

Mugu: Through the experience of life in Jesus Christ being your saviour and Lord.

Kadu: You start with the year you got saved, then you proceed with the sins you were doing before and finally what the Lord has done in your life.

Kiro: “I start with my name, and then say how I have interacted with the Lord and finally how I have experienced His power.

Kaia: While introducing yourself, you should say ‘my name’ but not ‘my names’, openly confess sins and repentance and forgiveness. You should also mention the date you got saved and the present walk with God. Say what brought you to repentance and your walk with God thereafter.

Notations

The majority of ordinary members across the four dioceses gives their testimony in a three-fold way. Firstly, they disclose their full identity, where and when they met with the Lord, what led to their conviction; secondly, they repent and confess their past sins. Then restitution and forgiveness of sins, thirdly journey of salvation with Jesus/walk in light or with God. A few mentioned a fourth aspect, which is future hope.

Kaia: While introducing yourself, you should say ‘my name’ but not ‘my names’, openly confess sins and repentance and forgiveness. You should also mention the date you got saved and the present walk with God. Say what brought you to repentance and your later walk with God.

Kiro: A born-again person gives testimony. It gives Brethren identity. “We start with saying the day, month, year and “the place Jesus met with me, we meet weekly for fellowship... we confess how God has journeyed with us and climaxes with the victory of Jesus in the trials we might be going through”.

Kiui: Testimony is given by anyone born again and starts from before getting saved. It details prosperity you have gained after getting saved. It brings fellowship amongst believers as they open up to each other. They testify about challenges in life and how the Lord helps them to overcome. In this way, they encourage each other.

Mugu: “…you start by mentioning your name, stating the year you got saved, and then you continue with how you met your saviour. You have to say the evil things or sins you committed before you were saved, and how you walk with the Lord since then.”

Kigi: start by giving name, where he had come from when he got saved: dates, month, year, day, and time, confession of sins of what God saved him from, mentioning those sins one by one.

Kini: start by saying the year you got saved and testified the sins you were saved from. You tell your local fellowship up to the district level. You testify how you have been walking with God.

Guse: Mention of name and dates in full, what drove you to salvation, tell how your Saviour has walked with you, finally what I yearn to achieve in salvation life.

Otya: Tell how the Lord is good, how he has sustained you, what he has done for you and how you have daily walked with God.

Kahs: “...it is based on my conversion experience when Christ saved me on April 29, 1967, at 3.00 A.M in a beer bar when drunk with alcohol… The particular sins that the Lord convicted me of I confessed and asked for his forgiveness…” Another Leader said testimony is about how he met with Christ, and the words that convicted him in August 1979 was from John 21:15-19.

Kima: An old man of 96 years said he gives testimony this way to defeat the devil as is written in Revelation that they overcame by the word of their testimony. In the same centre, a woman of 83 years said she gives her testimony because of what God has done for her, creating miracles for her. She tells how God saved her from sin. So when she sees sin, she points them out to the sinners. She feels her burdens were taken away; she claims to withstand trials and temptations. She hopes to receive everlasting life.

Caal: Starts from the time you received Christ in your heart. Mention the sins that you had committed before getting saved. Confess them.

Kagu: You start by saying your name when you got saved. “I was touched by the word that was preached… [which says] if we say we have no sins…” (1 John 1:8-10). You then confess sins and journey with the Lord on a daily basis.

Kigi: Start by indicating the time and the year you got saved, say how you felt. Also, provide information on whether it was a Bible verse or somebody’s testimony that led you to salvation.

Baho: The day one was saved, month, year, what God has done for you then and now. They also say what things they were saved from. Another respondent said it begins with mentioning the past life followed by day to day sanctification.

Kini: Testifying about what God has done in one’s life, has hope in the journey of salvation, trusting God through the temptations until one wins the crown of glory. Another person said that testimony begins with mentioning of the name, then what you were saved from and finally mention the daily walk with God.

Kigu: “I got saved on 26th February 1967 as a young girl while knitting. I was saved from lies”. She relates to Joseph’s victorious life and derives strength from reading the word of God. The other respondents said he begins by addressing the fellowship, Tukutenderezza meaning praise the Lord. “Then I mention my name, when and how I got saved. The Word of God that touched my soul, then I briefly narrate what my Lord Jesus Christ has done for me so far. However, the way (of saying testimony) may vary with situations.”

Muri: You start with the name, where he/she comes from, then says his/her present spiritual status and when he/she got saved. Also mention past life, public confession, restitution and battles with evil, daily walk with Christ, future expectations. The other respondent said that testimony begins from the first encounter with God, the exact date and what one was saved from followed by a daily walk with God. This involves public confession of sin and restitution (returning stolen items).
Kama: Start with saying, “I am one of you Brethren, I met with Christ at midnight, when I was asleep. I saw the light in the house, and I cried Lord, and I got saved. In the morning I sought the Brethren to give the testimony. In July 1991 there was a Convention at Kiini; I got a chance to give my testimony on how I met Christ. Also, you have to say which area you come from and your church.”

Notations

The majority of the respondents begins their testimony by declaring their full identity. Then the context of an encounter with the Lord (what led to a conviction- [lesson from the Bible], what one was saved from), confession and restitution. This was followed by stating your sojourn/walk with the Lord. The ordinary members and Leaders of EARM started their testimony by saying Tukutenderezza.

3.3.1.2 Have you ever heard of Keswick teachings? If yes, in what way have they influenced the prevailing socio-ethical life in EARM? If no, what influenced beliefs and practices apparent in the EARM?

Concerning whether the respondents have ever heard of Keswick teachings, the reply was as follows across the categories;

Kagu: “their way of salvation is similar.”

Notations
Out of the four dioceses, Kirinyaga ordinary leaders had no knowledge of Keswick influence on EARM. Others reported some little awareness of its impact. Its influence on Christian identity, Bible decrees and salvation procedure was noteworthy.

3.3.1.2.12 Prominent Stakeholders

Mobo: The Keswick theology influenced some of the missionaries to Africa especially CMS. The theology influenced some of the first converts, but Aldo laid some foundation for the East Africa Revival. The revival influenced the second generation Christians but entrenched a form of spirituality that became legalistic hence created hypocritical Christians.

Kaja: Yes, prompts Brethren daily devotion, it encourages profound sense of accountability.

Mwda: Yes, “I attended it in England, Great Lakes District. The Bible studies that went on continued to inflame my East Africa Revival Spirit in me”.

Hald: Yes “…based on my knowledge and observations, I would say that it has contributed to the strong commitment to the moral life in East Africans, and especially personal holiness.”

Wad: Yes, “…I think that the spirituality of the Keswick movement, and of the wider Holiness movement, has been very influential in putting a priority on personal holiness, defined as purity of heart and body, an emphasis on conversion and on the infilling of the Holy Spirit, a strict sexual morality, a lack of interest in overtly political issues.”

Gago: Yes, the theology of being saved and daily sanctification (Phil. 1:6). It is pietistic theology, nearly legalistic evangelical theology. It’s a replica of Wesleyan/Keswick theology, quite close to salvation by works rather than by grace and faith in the resurrected Christ.

Notations

The stakeholders were aware of the influence exemplified by activities of the pioneer missionaries and first convert who entrenched legalistic evangelical theology and hypocritical spirituality. They noted emphasis in daily devotion and accountability/moral life with strict sexual morality and personal holiness. They stressed the importance of Bible study, revival Spirit, conversion theology of being saved and infilling of the Holy Spirit and daily sanctification, close to salvation by works.

The final responses to Question 2 dealt with alternative sources of influence of the socio-ethical practices of walking in the light apart from Keswick theology. This question was put to the participants in their categories and was mostly answered by those who had not heard about Keswick movement.

Kiro: Different forms of spirituality.

Kadu: Salvation which one must confess.

Kini: influenced by the Word of God to grow spiritually through confessing Christ and through church conventions. Other influences are the mode of dressing, hairstyle, forgiveness of each other and humbleness.

Muri: EARM maintains gender separation and dignity as was taught by forefathers. Brethren’s teachings from Rwanda and Uganda influenced Kenyans. It shows separation from the congregation accusing it of being worldly.

Kigu: they said they were influenced by the Bible, open confession of sin and testimony, cleansing by the blood of Christ, legalistic life of do’s and don’ts.’

Kama: they were influenced by different teams’ fellowships’ (ranging from local Fellowship to East Africa Revival convention) that dictate certain teachings.

Bahò: Brethren love for one another and humbleness.

Kiya: lack of knowledge to many on the meaning of the movement leading to setting themselves apart from others to strictly follow Jesus' teachings.

Kaba: kimitugo ni thamiri yanigiriirie, kimaundu ni kurora ndikwenda maya, na maya ni ningwenda. Ndungituira mundu uge ni mwihia – no gutiga (regarding the socio-ethical beliefs and practices my conscience influenced me, as a person you decide to hate one practice and to like the other. You cannot judge a person and say he or she is a sinner – I will just stop).

Caal: knowing the truth through reading the word of God and being faithful to it.

Kima: “salvation came to us through Rwanda…”

Notations

Influences came through Rwanda and other spiritualties. Stress on Bible reading, mentorship, hearing confession about Christ and forgiveness/humility. Also, the emphasis on love for one another, terms like legalism/setting apart, fellowships and conventions.

Kama: the beliefs and practices were first taught at Kiini church around 1933 by people like Kaggia. He taught wearing of long dresses and also believed in dreams to get a marriage partner. They instill strong faith in their fellowships called Gatia-uki, overnight fellowships, etc. Also, teaches the importance of reading the Bible every day and arranges a convention of 3 days per year. Teachings by the central team and East African revival fellowship teams have impacted the beliefs and practices.

Muri: beliefs in the teachings handed down by East African leaders who traced their beliefs and practices from Uganda.

Kigu: Revival’s lifestyle; zeal and love for one another, conservative faith, staunch beliefs, dressing/moral code, stand on the Bible.

Kini: they were influenced by teachings from previous revival leaders. Beliefs and practices the teachings of St Paul’s on how to live the Christian life.

Baho: Brethren’s behaviour; they hate sin; they love God and look for help at the Cross.

Kagu: “origin is Rwanda.”

Caal: dressing style where women were supposed to cover their heads and eating habits where women were served first.

Kima: they were able to identify and move away from sins.

Kahs: “the Bible is the source of all that we believe in and also do.”

Kigi: before one was admitted as a member of EARM, one was required to stand in front of the congregation to denounce sin publicly and promise before God and those assembled that one would not live in sin. Norms of conduct were set by the East Africa Revivalists like polygamy, female initiation, snuff-taking, etc. Anyone who would get involved in sin would be excommunicated, and that was humiliating.

Otya: many fellowship meetings especially on Wednesdays where testimonies and Word of God are shared.

Kigi: Biblical teachings

Notations

Embu and Kirinyaga seem to have received indirect influences of Keswick theology and possibly from other spiritualities. The main components of responses from the perspectives of other purported forces apart from Keswick theology were: the teachings of Rwanda and from the previous Revival leaders, fellowships (convention) and Bible reading/instructions. The Cross of Christ, confession of sin, love for one another, strict norms of dressings and conduct.

3.3.1.2.15 Theological students

They have never heard of Keswick theology. They said the influence was from a literal interpretation of the Scripture which leads to legalism.

Notations

Socio-ethical life was influenced by the literal interpretation of Scripture.

They were not aware of any alternative influence.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Caal: a life-changing personal encounter with the Lord Jesus Christ. They have uncompromising faith but accept plaiting of hair but condemn sin.

Otya: Conventions based on one major theme of walking in the light and fellowships within the districts of its jurisdiction.

Mugu: Scripture and other practices of EARM.

Kahs: influenced by biblical teachings and other EARM’s norms.

Caal: they read scripture non-selectively and love one another.

Kini: “… elders of my church including my grandfather… could camp at our home, the so-called Kesha (overnight) meetings and fellowships, preaching, sharing testimonies and encouraging one another. I was much attracted to this.”

Kama: their conservative teaching, a way of giving testimony and selective contact with other members of society.

Notations

Mount Kenya Central seems unaware of any other alternative influences to the current socio-ethical life except Keswick theology. Other dioceses were aware of alternative influences like Scripture reading/teaching (conservative), sharing testimonies, separate life from society, strong faith, walking in the light and love/fellowship with each other.

3.3.1.2.17 Bishops

Bishop of Embu

Other influences were literal interpretation of the Scripture and influence of modernity.

Bishop of Mount Kenya Central

Not aware.

Bishop of Mount Kenya West

Influence of Church growth.

Notations

Interpretation of Scripture and challenges of modernity could inform church growth influenced by the revival.

3.3.1.2.18 Prominent stakeholders

Mobo: Little or no theological knowledge, Victorian ideals from Europe and repression of Christian teachings on being human.

Wad: Born again culture, strict moral discipline, the entrenchment of Pentecostalism and other forms of evangelical Christianity.

Gago: Strict religious position, moral, ethical conduct, legalistic theology, walking in the light, condemning social evils and peaceful coexistence by repentance and forgiveness. “…Jomo Kenyatta was influenced by their teachings in 1963 when he told the young nation, ‘forget the past, build the nation.’ He also said let us forgive both the former collaborators who took us to Colonial jails plus the colonialists, though we shall never forget."

Notations

Other alternative influenced people with little or no theological knowledge. The impact of Victorian ideals, born-again culture, other forms of evangelical Christianity and strict moral discipline (legalistic theology) of walking in the light – repentance, and forgiveness.

3.3.1.3 Describe walking in the light, showing how it could have brought division in the revival?

Kini: it means saying where they are going. Utheri ware (lets the light shine). They use this phrase when they go to the diocesan conventions. The group agrees that walking in the light has brought division.

Muri: it is telling others what one intends to do – walking in righteousness. Failure to walk in light brings division. New revelation/enlightenment has brought division in forms of Kufufuka (reawakened), Kupaa (rising), Mtama na maji (millet and water), etc.

Kigu: it is scriptural; we are the light of the world, openness and keeping fellowship/acceptance among the Brethren. Division occurs due to leadership’s ngarari (arguments), lack of brokenness and hypocrisy.

Kama: it is openness. This has brought division due to hypocrisy, long testimony - sometimes ridiculing the church especially youth, valuing testimonies more than the Word of God.

Baho: it is accepting Jesus as a personal saviour, walking with Jesus, walking in righteousness. The Kufufuka (reawakened) group and others split but returned later.

Caal: Kumaniria ngoro (reveals all/openness, even family issues); testimony is a part of walking in the light. In God, there is no darkness (John 1:5). They said walking in the light has not brought division except for those walking in darkness.
Kaba: “share with you, we are supposed to put in the light within ourselves everything good or bad. You are expected to know my stand from me not hearing from others. If I am out on a safari (journey), I am supposed to tell the Brethren I am away for prayer and that they don’t wait for me.”

Kiya: “without hypocrisy. Some followers were not truthful to the movement yet claiming they belong.”

Kagu Archdeaconry: talking about sins and the truth.

Kima: Being honest. It brought division in their way of greetings/ introducing themselves and sharing a testimony. Nowadays some Brethren are not honest, and when something is not brought to light it causes divisions.

Caal: this is about talking the truth. In 1942 some pastors confused EARM's walking in the light for another denominations.

Kigi: this is confessing sins publicly to be saved by Jesus. Hence walk in the light under new birth. The text about Nicodemus (John 3:1-21) has been popular with Brethren as it emphasizes public declaration of faith. Tuketenderezza Yesu has become an identification tune of the EARM’s fellowship.

Kigi: It is putting the programme of their daily activities on the table for the members to know.

Mugu: “the phrase has a meaning of testifying the bad and good things you do, used to do and asking for forgiveness. This causes disunity among Christians and even to the society at large”.

Kadu: it is to say all about yourself. This brought division because some of the wrongs were done to the members of the fellowship.

Kiro: having a closer walk with the Lord.

Kaia: it is openness, no hypocrisy. Others forsake those perceived to be not walking in the light.

Notations

Openness, i.e., no hypocrisy and a daily walk with the Lord. But the open confession of sin and hypocrisy brought division.

Kaia: Open confession, repentance, forgiveness, date of salvation, and daily walk with God.

Kiro: it is openness, shedding the light of activities and events. However, Luke 19:8, returning stolen goods/asking for forgiveness regardless whether the other party has accepted Christ or not, caused friction.

Kiui: sharing with the Brethren what you are doing or going through. Exposing lights outside the fellowship and derogatory statements “straight to heaven” has caused divisions.

Mugu: Sharing within Brethren right or bad experiences you are going through. This brings differences because the ones who confess without hiding blame those who don’t share openly.

Kigi: it is shedding light about your programme to the Brethren. It brought rift because some people were not open to some issues.

Kini: this is walking closely with the Lord, giving details of your testimony. But some testimony confuse especially young people. For instance, when “one testifies that he was adulterous or a thief, it is like telling the young you can start like me and at my age, you get saved.”

Guse: testifying without hypocrisy. Lack of transparency brings division.

Otya: doing everything truthfully among the brothers. If somebody is accused of not walking in the light on some known sins he/she is chased from the fellowship and told thii ugethe Jesu (Search for Jesus).

Kahs: saved person shares forthcoming activities like marriage, buying land or putting up a stone building. It is shedding light on daily matters, more so to the Brethren.

Kima: this is speaking of our sins in repentance; it also means telling the truth of our whereabouts, openness. It became divisive after the church accused it of “naughty” statements before children during testimonies.

Caal: to be transparent and truthfulness. It led to split after one’s sin has been exposed.
Kagu: it is information to Brethren about your intentions, no darkness but openness. It brings division when one ignores walking in the light, or there is perceived darkness in your walk; one leaves the group or not attends Fellowship.

Kigi: this is a public confession of sins to be saved by Jesus Christ. It has contributed to division because a member could publicly confess sins that are touching the other group members. Due to shame, one could leave the fellowship. The other cause has been holier than thou attitude among some members.

Bahö: notifications of your intentions/activities/ public confession of aspects of life. Those who oppose the light quit, or backslide.

Kini: sharing your personal life and regular testimony. Without testimony/walk in the light, one backslides and is forsaken by others.

Kigu: being open about yourself. If one is not open he ceases to be a member and may form another group.

Muri: it is openness within Brethren, repenting the long done sins. This caused division because of lack of trust, hypocrisy, exposing personal matters to outsiders and show of wealth. Those who fail to repent do it personally.

Kama: this is a confession of all sins. It has caused division due to its stress on purity thus keeps others away. It is long and tedious, and exposes the person.

Notations

The majority saw walk in the light as a daily walk with the Lord, a daily testimony, public confession/openness to God and humanity or sharing your personal life. The division came when one failed to share testimony with other people. Thus, hypocritical holiness and exposure of one’s secrets brought splits. That is, those who were perceived as not walking in the light were forsaken.

3.3.1.3.3 Theological students

EARM teaches public confession of sin, walking in the light, stress on salvation, emphasis on the Bible and sanctification. The beliefs and practices concern all Christians; modesty dressing like covering of hair by women and shaving beard by all men. Testimonies sometimes lead to social problems like family violence and breakups.
Notations

They noted public confession of sin, Bible teaching, and stress on sanctification. Strict dressing code and damaging testimonies were obvious influences.

Kama: how to give testimony, fellowship, and visitations amongst Brethren. It influences dressing code – no beard, no miniskirts, and ladies cover their heads, ways of giving testimonies (sometimes long and exaggerated), repetition of repented sins, strict morals and ways of reading the Scripture.

Muri: it emphasis distinct lifestyle, righteousness, cleanliness, and shares your whereabouts. But dressing code hinders many mostly youth.

Dok: it teaches confession of sin, about testimony. It influences lifestyle, commitment to Christians and morality, but has corrupted theology of justification and sanctification, believes in “other salvation” [Spirit filled or second blessing] apart from baptism.

Kini: it teaches confession of sins, Jesus as Lord and Saviour, purity, brotherly love, prayer life, and daily Bible study. It influences concern for one another, checks on daily relationships, role models of Brethren clergy – walk in the light of God, but can be judgmental on non-Brethren, personalizing salvation, its theology molds many priests.

Kagu: Teaches salvation, fellowships, Christian discipleship, deeper salvation experience (kurikiria) - 1John 1:1-10, Christ is the light, no darkness, regenerates Christians’ daily walk in the light. It influences Gospel incarnation into Africans thought pattern and expressions, though mentioning of sins and hypocrisy kept many people away.

Caal: it teaches walking righteously with God, repentance, forgiveness, and humility. It influences social, ethical discipline – moral uprightness, but its focus on heaven slows economic activities. Also categorizing Christians affects social cohesion as some people feel they are not in the same ministry unless they follow their teachings and practices.

Kama Secondary: Teaches repentance, sanctification, openness and transparency and influences dressing codes.
Mugu: illustrates sanctification, renewal, and openness amongst Brethren. It influences morality of the church in weekly fellowships, enhancing mission and evangelism.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Otya: It teaches the salvation message, that people might see Jesus and offers proper mentorship - gendered seating in the church. It influences anti-social attitude with non-Brethren and self-reliance; no borrowing bank loans. It also encourages modest dressing, disciplined worship, challenges charismatic lifestyle – Public address system and clapping of hands.

Thuri: it teaches walking with God but fails to understand the meaning of walking in the light. It is seen as a church within a church and thus is not quite integrated because of its ensuing regulations.

Caal: Teaches Bible, Jesus, salvation, open repentance/confession, and firm faith. It is a biblical principle to walk in the light. “You are the light of the world.” The late Bishop Obadiah Kariuki, a keen Brethren influenced Anglicans socially.

Caal: it teaches about repentance, confession of sins and God's righteousness to inform our beliefs and practices like integrity and honesty reflected in our actions and behaviour. However, there is no unity in church activities.

Mugu: teaches public confession of sin and leaving a sinful lifestyle. However, it does not accept church census since theirs is in heaven. Ways of saying testimony differs from general Anglicans who only like to testify of what God has done for them.

Kiro: Sharing with Brethren every aspect of life. However, shedding some lights brought divisions in the EARM. For example, a man shed light that he slept with a lay reader (woman). Another said he killed a man in the presence of children. Also holier than thou attitude brings division.

Notations

EARM teaches confession of sins, restitution, daily Bible study, sanctification and renewal, Christian discipleship, deeper salvation experience, walking righteously with God, Jesus is Lord and Saviour, purity, brotherly love, prayer life and about fellowships with one another. It influences legalism; dressing code, corrupted theology and is judgmental that leads to a church within the church/categorizing Christians, hypocrisy, and shedding of deep lights.

3.3.1.3.5 Bishops

Bishop of Mount Kenya West

Church growth/spirituality is founded on these teachings; an openhearted ethical life which is biblically based. Jesus was against hypocrisy (not in the light). Walking in the light emphasizes about the new man, family stability, and modest dressing.

Bishop of Mount Kenya Central

Walking in the light teaches repentance, forgiveness, restitution, fellowship with God and each other, self-examination, how to be right with God and other people. It influences transparency and accountability in Christian life and particularly in church leadership.

Bishop of Embu

Walking in the light teaches centrality of scripture, confession of sins and focus on heaven. It influences leaders to be a light to the world – provides social and spiritual direction. Most senior clergies are the product of EARM; affirms anti-alcoholism, dressing ethics, walking in the light.

Notations

Walking in the light teaches centrality of scripture, repentance/forgiveness/restitution, openhearted ethical life, right with God and other people. It influences renewal/new man, family life, moral code and openness in Christian life/leadership.

3.3.1.3.6 Prominent stakeholders

Gago: it teaches confession before preaching, as friends meet, singing its anthem and encouraging public officers to be open and speak up against injustices. It is legalistic, riba ritwo ribia (sin be called sin), too open to the extent of hurting them socially. Second or third wives viewed as a sin, no bank loans or keeping dogs/security officers. It fails to document their theology by publication, hence getting overtaken by the Pentecostal wave; no budgets, no bureaucracy, no membership lists, no subscription fees, no minutes, no officials, no salaries, no headquarters, etc. However, EARM’s approach could help Kenyans overcome tribalism, corruption, hypocrisy, xenophobia or hatred for Somalis – seen as terrorists.

Wad: it teaches the need to be born again, to be broken at the cross, to be saved by the blood of Jesus, need to testify to this salvation, confess sinful life before getting saved (testimony); discipline of conversion and walking in the light – strong disincentive to committing sin after salvation – can lead to hypocrisy; critique of the worldly church; need to preach to Christians and non-Christians to get saved, even clergy, it refrains from politics and owns up shortcomings. It upholds honesty and openness but can be judgmental, holier than thou attitude – hypocritical – opposite of walking in the light.

EARM is ‘ideal’ for evangelical churches, though the majority might not conform to the model. The Anglican, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches have been profoundly influenced but have many ‘unsaved’ members. Pentecostal churches often claim to consist of the saved, but this is not true for the mainline churches. Sexual ethics – emphasis on abstinence, monogamy, and faithfulness within marriage; though not exemplified in the life of the church. These ethical standards justify hostility against homosexuality, but criminalization of gay relations by state suggests lapse from the ethics of earlier Balokole which thought the government could not enforce morality.

Hald: it teaches Keswick moral values, the evangelical doctrine of salvation – emphasis on renewal and personal conversion. However focus on moral issues can become moralism – can diminish the gospel of grace and forgiveness, but when the practice of repentance is within the economy of grace it can be a vibrant life in Christ and witness to the power of transformed living in the world. It has a strict legacy; strong emphasis on moral rectitude, the holiness of life, a genuine conversion.

Mwda: it teaches receiving Christ into your life as Saviour and Lord, repentance and faith; testify publicly, restitution, walk in the light, Bible study and constant prayer, firm testimony, attend fellowship and conventions, wait with zeal for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and His kingdom, discipline of accountability. Most clergy and Bishops are influenced; candidates selected for theological training are often expected to give testimony.

Mobo: it acknowledges the sinful status of humanity, confession of sin, walking in the light, commitment to lead a perfect life, “I was influenced by a Quaker ethos in terms of recognizing that [image] of God in all people and living the teachings of Jesus in the way I treat people”. Its theology does not impact on life, only on most of the leaders as far as the doctrine of salvation is concerned but not reflected in the socio-ethical life. Anglican lifestyle has been influenced by the society around. The leadership has no particular theology but appears schizophrenic in faith. For survival’s sake, they rely on who has power and manipulate the power to survive. There is disconnect between the theology and lifestyle of the members.

Kaja: it teaches confession, repentance, and radical moral transformation. Although it is biblically based, it can at times be intrusive. As late as the 1990s, all candidates for the ordained ministry were expected to have been actively involved in the EARM; Kiambu district revival fellowship still meets once a year at St Paul's University a practice that began in 1930s when Bishop Obadiah Kariuki and Canon Elijah Gachanja taught at the school.

Notations

Bishops noted significance of confession of sinful life, born again, holiness, moral rectitude, genuine conversion, walking in the light, the blood of Jesus, restitution, Bible study, prayer and firm testimony. Many were influenced including clergy, though some are hypocritical. Walking in the light teaches a strong disincentive to sin and repentance within the economy of grace.

3.3.1.4 What's the dominant text (s) used by members that could have led to the split

Kigi: not aware

Mugu: Isaiah 1:18 “Come now, let us reason together, says the Lord. Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they are red as crimson, they shall be as wool”. There are also other biblical texts given during their meetings.

Kadu: 2 Cor 6:14-18; they emphasize verse 17 “Therefore come out from them and be separate.”

Kiro: “Do not put off the Spirit’s fire” (1 Thess 5:19).

Kaia: “Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come!” (2 Cor. 5:17).

Kagu: “come to me all you who are weary and burdened and I will give you rest…” (Matt. 11:28-30). Also, Matt. 5:13-14, “you are the salt of the earth…you are the light of the world…” others are Mark 1:15 (Repent for the Kingdom of God is near). This text was used to challenge those who were not in fellowship with the Brethren. Also, see Matt 13:30 (wheat and tares to grow together until the harvest).

Kima: there is no particular text, mostly use Acts 9 which demonstrates change from Saul to Paul.
Caal: Jer. 7:3 “this is what the Lord Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Reform your ways and your actions, and I will let you live in this place.”

Kigi: Not aware.

Baho: Rom. 12:17-21 (don’t revenge) and other texts as God would reveal.

Kini: no dominant texts: but texts that teach against sin.

Muri: depends on season and revelation from God.

Kigu: Philippians 3:1-12 (no confidence in the flesh) but monthly readings and context are given prominence.

Kama: Exodus 10:27-29 (The Lord hardened Pharaoh’s, heart…); Num. 21:4-9 (people complained…look at the bronze snake, and you shall live); 1 Cor. 1:9 “God, who has called you into fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, is faithful”; Rev. 3:1-2 “he who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches”; Isa. 43:1 (Fear not, for I have redeemed you).

Kiya: no dominant text; they believe all Scripture is God-breathed.

Caal: No single verse is given dominance in the Bible.

Kaba: Heb. 10:25 (not forfeit fellowship).

_Notations_

There was no dominant biblical text.

Kiro: Luke 19:8 Zacchaeus returned illegal possessions has been used to justify returning stolen goods, seeking forgiveness from accomplices in crime. The interpretation of Gen 12:1 led parents to desert their unwedded pregnant daughters and would not even attend their weddings. Also, Daniel 1:8ff led some Brethren to refuse kingly food and to shun social gatherings.

Kaia: Lack of walk in light leads to being sidelined.
Kitu: dressing code 1 Cor. 11:13-15 Brethren took this text literally, and many youths left the church in the 1990s over hair and dressing.

Mugu: notes about three groups: firstly, Simama has been noted for the use of the phrase Yesu atosha (Jesus satisfies); secondly, Kufufuka says they have been raised from sins. Members share two testimonies, one about being born again (saved) and the other about when one was raised or revived (Eph.5:14). Thirdly, Mtama na maji (sorghum and water) led to Kupaa faction, that lays its foundation on Dan. 1:8-15 (Daniel refused kingly food).

Kigi: Not sure of the text.

Kini: Gen 12:1ff, some Brethren interpreted it to mean saved people should leave their unsaved families.

Otya: 1 Tim. 5:23, St Paul’s challenge to drink a little alcohol led to some members keeping little wine in their houses. Some saw it a sinful and left the Fellowship.

Kahs: in the 1970s there were social and economic problems; borrowing loans became a challenge to the borrowers. Interpretation of Dan. 1:8-21 led to Kupaa group and which was against earthy influence. Others argued that leadership struggles were another cause of splits.

Kima: text on confession with your mouth (Rom. 10:9), some brethren confessed by mentioning their sins while others refused. But try to live well with all men (Rom. 12:18).

Caal: Isaiah 60:1 Arise, Shine for your light has come. EARM is about walking in the light but many walk in darkness.

Kagu: issues of repenting and confessing; forced to repent sins you don’t know, you leave the group for not repenting (repent the kingdom of God is near); keeping of dogs made brethren not visit Matofu in Uganda. Some were killed because they were regarded as a sin.

Kigi: interpretation of Eph.5:14 meant that the saved should be saved anew. But Eph.6:13-20 was used by Kusimama (standing up) group to encourage Christians to withstand challenges.

Baho: some said it was an individual decision, not a biblical text. Others cited text like Daniel 1:12 (give us nothing but vegetables to eat and water to drink). This led to Mtama na Maji, which means millet and water. This formed Kupaa (rising) group that set itself for simple life, e.g., no wedding cake, expensive wedding dress, etc. Also, Gen. 12:1 (Leave your country and your people…). Some sold everything and ‘physically’ left their families to distant places to serve God.

Kini: texts related to filling of the Holy Spirit (Pentecostalism), Kaggia brought speaking in tongues in 1946 leading to a split.

Kigu: Ephesians 5:14, “Wake up O sleeper, rise from the Dead, and Christ will shine on you.” This led to Kufufuka (reawakening) that accused other members who were not awakened as dead. Other texts include those against sin and thus calls for confession, repentance, and forgiveness, e.g., Ezek. 18:4 (the soul that sins shall surely die); Rom. 10:9 (confession); John 3:16 (God’s love the world).

Muri: John 11:25 “I am the resurrection and life” is a pleasant verse for Kufufuka who claims to follow the resurrected Christ; Eph. 5:14, led to Kufufuka in 1967 – “Arise” was to leave EARM; Dan. 1:8f to live like Daniel, shun the royal meal at king’s table for water and vegetables. Thus, applied as Mtama na Maji (see above) which was understood in 1969 as leaving EARM to form another group.

Kama: Heb. 10:24-25 regular fellowship and meetings; James 1:19-21 giving of testimony; 2 Cor. 6:14-16 separation from unbelievers; 2 Cor. 3:2-3 demonstration of purity; 1 Cor. 11:15-16 men should not keep beards and women should cover their heads.

Notations

There were a couple of recurring texts: Daniel 1: 8ff; Gen. 12:1ff; Eph. 5:14; 1 Cor. 11:15-16; Rom. 10:9. 2Cor 6:14-18 was also, mentioned by the ordinary members.

Mugu: Female circumcision controversy led to split.

Otya: Mark 10:21 “sell everything you have and give to the poor, then follow me”; Isaiah 3:16 haughty women… adornment with rings; Acts 2:45 selling everything; 1 Cor. 11:14 dressing code; issues of long and short hair.

Thri: no idea.

Caal: Daniel 1:8ff in Kiambu 1987 led to a split from EARM known as Mtama na Maji. They referred to Daniel’s story and refused to eat the king’s delicacies. In Murag’a the split became the people of the light and based their belief on 1John 2:9-11, saying ithui nituonete utheri (we have seen the light). It thus came to be called Ngwataniro ya utheri (Fellowship of the light) based on Matt. 5:14. They accept praise the Lord greetings, do not accept weddings of expectant girls nor renewal marriages; the third group came to be called revival fellowship which believes in walking in the light.

Caal: Rev 18:4-8; 2 Cor. 6:14-18; Mt. 8:10-12; Mt. 15:1-2; Romans 4:10-12.

Kitu: Daniel 1:8ff, Daniel, and his friends refused to eat good food from the king’s table.

Mugu: I Cor. 11:14 women to cover their heads while praying.

Notations
Some repeated texts: 1 Cor. 11:14; 2 Cor. 6:14-18; Eph. 5:14; Dan. 1:8ff.

3.3.1.4.5 Bishops

Mount Kenya West

There were no particular texts, but a social lifestyle; dressing code, shaving of the hair leads to walking in the light (Utheri) faction.

Mount Kenya Central

Eph. 5:14; Dan. 1:12

Embu

Not particular text splits caused by personal differences; old clergy wanted to take up leadership of EARM. There was also social life differences leading (2005-2008) to different fellowships, i.e., Nembure and Kiangima (worked with the church).

Notations

Bishop of Mount Kenya central indicated Eph. 5:14; Daniel 1:12 as the cause of split.

3.3.1.4.6 Prominent stakeholders

Gago: Prov. 13:20; John 15:13; Prov. 27:6; Amos 3:3; 2Cor. 6:17; 2 Cor. 6:14.

Wad: Eph. 5:14 is basic to the Reawakened, Abazukufu; those who constantly confess sins after conversion is dead, they have no power of Spirit to overcome sin. Ordinary Balokole is dead, abafu. The split was formalized in 1972.

Hald: Not sure.

Mwda: Dan. 1:8ff; Romans 13:8 (let no debt remain outstanding); 2 Cor. 6:17 (come out from them and be separate).

Mobo: resurrection stories of Jesus; interpretation of the meaning of the death of Jesus based on love or the blood of Jesus – thus love for Christ Church in Africa, and mainstream stressed the blood of Jesus.

Kaja: Biblical interpretation not solely responsible; each faction used their favourite biblical texts to support positions that they already held. Also, strong personalities and divergent attitudes to cultural practices could have led to splits.
Notations

The most recurring texts were Daniel 1:8ff, 2 Cor. 6:17; 2 Cor. 6:14; Eph. 5:14.

3.3.1.5 Briefly describe the history of the split in EARM, showing how it has affected the mission of the church

Kiro: the holier than thou attitude has hampered the church mission.

Mugu: division came due to misinterpretation and understanding of testimony. This affected the growth of the church mission.

Kadu: division affects church growth and financial base.

Kigi: division brought by some people advocating to be governed by cultural beliefs and practices while others sought biblical teachings. Also, public confession of sins brought tensions.

Kaia: division brought by lack of openness and doubt of others’ salvation. This brought enmity/mistrust among Brethren and with other Christians – weakening mission.

Kama: interpretation of various biblical passages and leadership wrangles brought division. This affected church mission: deprived of leadership who has testimonies, young people declined to join the fellowships, no motivation in the church to accede to the fellowship, no Brethren support of church activities, no church support for Brethren activities.

Kigu: disagreement with the vicar, damaging testimony. This has led to hypocrisy and lack of brokenness in the church.

Muri: took place in 1967 between reawakening (resurrected) and the dead (born again) in 1967. There were confusing testimonies some saying they were resurrected and accusing others of deadness. Apart from reawakened (uriukio, kutufuka), other splits were Mtama na Maji (sorghum and water), ona Yesu (see Jesus) and Kusimama (Stand). This led to separation amongst the Brethren

Kini: division started in 1970. It impacted the mission of the church positively particularly with smart dressing code and preaching from the Bible.

Kigi: in the 1960s, Brethren’s initial enthusiasm and holiness had lapsed in terms of dressing, fashion and aggressive witnessing. This split originated from a leading lay evangelist from Baganda Mr. William Nagenda. In his sermons, he emphasized that revived Christians should avoid worldly involvement, particularly to refrain from bank loans. This was guided by Eph. 5:14 which required those who were saved to be saved again leading to the Awake (Kwarahuka or Kuriuka) group. Some Brethren disagreed with this campaign and saw nothing wrong with taking bank loans to improve their welfare. This led to separate meetings. In 1956 Nthama (Exodus) faction sprang up in Nairobi. They regarded traditional/nicknames to be a sin. They identified themselves with Kuhama (Exodus) group. The other faction is Kusimama (Standing) emphasizing Christians to stand firm to withstand challenges (Ephesians 6:13-15). Finally, came Kupaa/Mtama na Maji (Sorghum and water) which came to be known as ascension/rising up. However, there hasn’t been a serious disagreement within Revival Fellowship in Embu and Mbeere. They remain united but not uniform.

Caal: it was due to leadership misunderstanding which led to some beginning new denominations.

Kima: division began in 1969s when “two lights” arose, one had an open confession of sins, and the other was not open. After the 1970s “deep lights” (personal testimonial lights) were discouraged because of mistrust within the members. There were “lights” that acted as rules or codes of ethics, e.g., dressing and hair codes.

Kagu: it came when the team members stopped walking together. The ensuing different views and ideas affected the mission.

Kaba: rebuke to the revivalist for not giving money for mission.

Caal: not aware.

Kiya: conflict with church leadership.

Notations

It was noted that division began in 1956; later Nthama in Nairobi became Kuhama, then became Kusimama (Eph.6:14-20) and 1967 Re-awakening (Eph. 5:14) which was led by William Nagenda. Another faction was Kupaa. There were other internal splits of “lights” in 1969. Others claimed the 1970s and 1980s. But most of them noted the 1967 date. Leadership and legalistic codes of conduct, and devastating testimonies were also blamed for the split. This caused disharmony in the mission field which affected church growth.

Kama: split has led to new fellowships, new denominations, backsliding and desertion by young people. The fellowship is not involved in church activities.

Muri: it began with conventions in Uganda. The preaching from Ps. 127:1ff encouraged people to trust God for protection, no need for dogs for security. Also, interpretation of Eph. 5:14 led to reawakening group claiming they have resurrected. This confused the members, leading to separation.

Kigu: By 1967 fellowship was one: but different beliefs and practices like not to keep dogs, not tolerate pregnant daughters and not have debts. For example, Ufufuo, mtama na maji (kupaa) and the quest for leadership have brought harm to the mission of the church.

Kini: history began in Nairobi; leaders had a meeting and refused to accept the new movement but some accepted.

Baho: Not aware.

Kagu: there were divisions in the fellowship; some held meetings at home, others left the church, weakness of clergy vs. Fellowship. Thus, no effective mission, as each justified its positions leading to different missions from either group.

Caal: fighting for leadership positions. Some members started their own churches.

Kima: people sought a salvation (saved) that does not mention sin.

Kahs: division weakened EARM’s unity, slowed witness spirit, with each defending its theological stand and thus failed witness to the church.

Kigi: beginning 1960s following a lapse in holiness (Eph. 5:14) and witnessing, refrain from a bank loan, being saved anew for the saved leading to awake group and separate meetings.
They separated from culture due to beliefs and practices. In 1956 there emerged Nthama faction, then Kusimama (Ephesians 6:14-20) and Kupaa/Mtama na Maji.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Otya: leadership; some fellowship leaders were leaders in the church. So they had followers, and their division caused wrangles.

Guse: Not aware.

Mount Kenya Central

Kini: EARM separates from others (sinners), and this affects the mission, Jesus came for such not the righteous.

Kigi: due to the unequal recognition of members.

Mugu: revival arrived in Kenya in 1930s as one block, like a church within church, different fellowship meetings leading to unbiblical founded mission.

Kitu: the 1969 oath-taking led to the split. Some went to Pentecostal churches; dressing code (1 Cor. 11:14-16), youth left the church in the 1990s over hair and dressing, Public address system and Pentecostal worship. Parents abandoned daughters who become pregnant before marriage (father refused to attend such weddings). Also, dowry payment in terms of beer caused the split.

Kiro: division came when confessing Christians were excommunicated from mainstream churches. Some members took an oath (during Kenya’s struggle for independence) and others never claiming they had drunk the blood of Jesus. This brought serious split with some members joining other churches.

Another cause of division was conservation whereby some members stressed issues like dressing, plaiting of hair (1 Cor. 11: 14-16). Thus youth left the church in 1997/98 in Kimathi region (accused of not born again). Also, public address system was not appreciated as Brethren claimed to pray loudly is a sin. Those who pray loudly and in tongues were seen as sinners.

Gen. 12:1ff led to some people in Murang’a to desert their daughters who gave birth at home or refuse to attend weddings of such daughters. Deriving from Daniel 1:8ff many Brethren did not go to gathering because the food was worldly.

Kaia: division was due to lack of openeness, doubt of others’ salvation, enmity/mistrust among Brethren and with other Christians.
Notations

The Uganda Convention, and Ps 127:1ff encouraged people to rely on God’s protection, not on dogs. Also, interpretation of Eph. 5:14 led to reawakening. Some notes that the Fellowship was one before 1967. Some think in Kenya split began in Nairobi; there is mention of Nthama 1956 and another meeting in Nairobi that confirmed the split. Ephesians 6:14-20 was applied by Kusimama group to stand against Kufufuka group. 1969 oath-taking also led to divisions. Some left for Pentecostal churches due to the interpretation of 1 Cor. 11:14-16 that oppressed the youth. In 1990s lots of youth left Anglican for Pentecostal churches. Gen. 12: 1ff led to some parents abandoning their unwedded pregnant daughters. This has affected the mission of the church due to mistrust within the church, separation, inequality, excommunication and poorly biblically founded a mission.

3.3.1.5.3 Theological students

3.3.1.5.4 Clergy

Kama: splits have led to liberalism in the church exemplified by women becoming clergy. However, youth left the Fellowship leading to declining morals in the church and society.

Muri: Too much shedding of light brings division.

Dok: not sure.

Kini: Holier than thou attitude that differed with youth. EARM seemed like a church within a church.

Kagu: EARM opposed hierarchy structures of the church and conflicted with bishops. Also, poor interpretation and application of biblical texts brought splits.

Caal: avoid reading the scripture selectively and embrace all believers.

Kama Secondary: theological differences brought a split. It slowed down evangelism.

Mugu: not sure.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West
Otya: observes doctrinal issues and financial management as the primary cause of splits.

Guse: aware of splits but notes competing interests of different groups affect the mission.

Caal: the split affected the church negatively especially central Kenya where Utheri Fellowship was strongly led by the late Bishop Obadiah Kariuki. This resulted in controversy in central Kenya. Some clergy opposed open confession of sins and recommended disclosure should be made secretly to God.

Caal: a cloud of confusion particularly to the young generation, lack of synergy for church growth and development.

Kitu: The Movement has lost virtues like holiness, love, no longer carry burdens or support its members. This has led to weakening the mission because others lose confidence in the Fellowship.

Mugu: EARM exemplifies hypocritical holiness which leads to separation affecting mission because EARM is a key member of the Anglican Church.

_Notations_

Most respondents avoided the history part of the question but were comfortable with effects. For example, they noted liberalism as women became clergy, declining morals as the youth left the Fellowship, church hierarchy conflicts with fellowship, poor biblical teaching and theological differences, open confession of sins and hypocritical holiness. Some observe a declining evangelism and apathy.

3.3.1.5.5 Bishops

_Mount Kenya West_

He noted a congregation split into two, bought a plot and build a church.

_Mount Kenya Central_

Not aware.

_Bishop of Embu_

Split in Embu (2005 -2008) affected conventions because Brethren are both members of the church and fellowship. This led to decline in spirituality.
Notations

They were not quite aware of the earlier splits but impacts; construction of a new church, effects on conventions and a drop in spirituality.

3.3.1.5.6 Prominent stakeholders

Gago: splits have weakened EARM. They were brought on by lack of theological training and versions of being saved. He noted that revival has no leader as the Holy Spirit is, but some retired teachers imposed themselves isolating others. The habit of attacking clergy as not saved weakened their bargaining power. They dismissed Canon Johana Njumbi as not saved for sniffing tobacco.

It dates from 1937. In 1967 Arahuka basing its position on Eph. 5:14, remained like an opposition party within a church assassinating one another while hiding under walking in the light. Thus its mission weakened with youths joining Pentecostal churches.

Wad: noted earlier as a result of Eph. 5:14 leading to the formalization of the split in 1972. Balokole movement has always been at loggerheads with the ‘nominal’ church. Recently revival saw itself as the legislators of the church with the majority of Anglican bishops claiming to be part of the revival. Evangelical/Revivalists are often at the heart of church-sponsored mission activities and on a personal level in evangelism.

Hald: only general knowledge.

Mwda: splits compromised real witness of the Brethren all over East Africa.

Mobo: Joremo vs. Johera splits; Johera loved polygamists but Joremo the True Anglicans were hypocritical not wanting them near. Sexuality issues challenges Anglican Church today, for example, Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI). Some church leaders have accepted criminalization of LGBTI people.

Kaja: it was 1970s, not sure of details.

Notations

Splits in revival began in 1937; Joremo vs. Johera. Some mention 1967; the Abafu (dead) and Bazukufu (reawakened). Brethren attacked clergy saying they were not saved. The youth were joining Pentecostal churches. This compromised witness though the majority of Anglican bishops claimed to be part of the revival, some accepting to criminalize LGBTI.
3.3.1.6 What change would you recommend for the current socio-ethical life?

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Kaba: no change; it’s an individual conscience between you and God.

Caal: All, not just EARM to repent and turn to God (Rom. 10:1), to be saved not just repentance to avoid nominal Christians.

Kiya: it’s good to know the motive of EARM. It is a vehicle to help people grow spiritually and not a faction.

Kama: to stick to God’s word and not our beliefs/knowledge. Testimonies should not be a measure of personal salvation rather it should glorify God.

Kigu: to have a biblical foundation; modesty dressing code and friendly testimonies.

Muri: should attract young people and avoid rigid fellowship/laws. Brethren should be incorporated in the preaching programme and priests should provide mentorship.

Kini: advocated status quo: that people should dress well; respect gender dress and observe teaching about the hairstyle.

Kagu: to obey the Bible, have one faith, understand God’s law and change Revival leadership.

Kigi: to accommodate fashion norms, reach out to all languages and avoid micromanaging youth.

Mugu: Brethren encouraged to adopt improved social life.

Kadu: EARM to embrace change and to avoid legalistic rules that hinder youth to join Fellowship.

Kaia: to shy away from hypocrisy, theft, drunkenness, laziness and strict dressing code.

Notations

Embrace a changed social life (modesty), return to old Brethren lifestyle, and good mentors for youth and clergy, church to use Brethren, proper use of the Bible and practise constructive testimonies.

Kama: to sensitize people on the Word of God, proper nurture of converts and encourage conventions.

Muri: word of God should guide the converts and not socio-ethical rules. Avoid self-centredness, wealthy and poor should coexist (equality). Help the less fortunate to harness unity.

Kigu: Address the dressing code (my dress my choice), dowry price and secularism. Engage youth. Avoid other activities during Brethren Sunday and clergy to provide proper mentorship for youth.

Kini: Encourage modest dressing – avoid fashions and makeup that show nakedness. Makeup fosters inequality.

Baho: to relax dressing code/makeup; girls should not go near men (behave like animals), respect gender roles; men should not wear earrings and necklace, short hair or headscarf for women and no decoration.

Kagu: Encourage unity of clergy and brethren, provide one Fellowship Sunday per month, and walk in the light and clergy to teach salvation.
Caal: to relax dressing style; women should be allowed to preach with or without a headscarf.

Kima: “we should identify and repent our sins, ‘sins’ have returned to the church. We should state sins in our testimonies and speak the truth”.

Kahs: focus on the spiritual renaissance in the church and to respond to negative socio-ethical issues like corruption in Kenya.

Kigi: Address the generation gap; should not condemn youth, appreciate African heritage’s positive values – circular sitting during fellowship meetings is African. New Testament should not be used as an instruction manual for norms/overly burdensome teaching and preaching. Encouraged to use lectionary readings because not all saved people can preach. Need preaching lessons.

Otya: avoid holier than thou attitude.

Guse: accept the transformation.

Kini: EARM to accept the ministry of the Holy Spirit and allow change.

Kigi: to address dressing code, uphold morality and engage in economic activities.

Mugu: should join self-help social groups and avoid being conservative, should not compare 1930s or 1950s salvation standards with today, and accommodate young people who confess Christ and have good morals.

Kitu: to address dressing code, to embrace 21st century culture and Brethren to embrace healthy African culture/norms.

Kiro: teaching about dressing code, embrace good morals, good cultural activities and all accept Christ.

Kaia: shy away from hypocrisy, theft, drunkenness, laziness and dressing code.

Notations

They emphasized; moderate dressing code, encouraged Fellowship to join social groups, good mentorship for youth, clergy to include Brethren in the Sunday Church programme, proper use of the Bible and to embrace healthy cultural norms/activities.
3.3.1.6.3 Theological students

Brethren should learn interpretation of the Bible, appreciate dynamism in fellowship and accommodate other people, especially youth.

Notations

Bible should be used correctly and fellowship to be inclusive.

Mugu: EARM and the Anglican Church should work together to fight the devil than fight each other. EARM should be less strict on morals.

Kigu: EARM to be less conservative, embrace change as most Brethren are old people.

Caal: to preach and teach the unity of purpose based on Eph. 4, one God, one Spirit and one hope.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Caal: everyone should be saved but confess sins to God alone.

Thuri: Emphasis on the oneness of God.

Otya: Allow interaction between both sexes and enrich all church departments.

Mugu: revisit public relations, dressing code and morality, and handling marriage conflict.

Kama Secondary: to dress decently and believers walk as per their confession.

Caal: there should be freedom to worship in the truth and the Spirit.

Kagu: Fellowships should carefully handle the Scripture in the Spirit to bring harmony and growth of the church. Should provide for conflict resolution and not just condemn without enough information.

Kini: Encourage salvation for all, a special workshop for believers on spirituality and Brethren to embrace change.

Dok: to struck a balance between nominalism and holier than thou attitude.

Muri: to give room for change and avoid rigidity.

Kama: teach actual Word of God, encourage worship dynamics and recognize Brethren in the church.

Notations

To balance between nominalism and holier than thou (hypocrisy), allow dynamism in worship, recognize Brethren in church, proper exegesis of the Bible, embrace change, a workshop on spirituality, allow interaction of young people of both sexes and unity as per Eph. 4, oneness of God.

3.3.1.6.5 Bishops

Embu

Uphold EARM’s heritage of addressing sin but allow change. The church should mediate between Brethren and other Christians.

Mount Kenya Central

Encourage Christians on repentance and transparency.

Mount Kenya West

The church should imitate EARM’s way (strict ethics – no beard) and bring people to church.

Notations

They encouraged the church to address sin; allow change, repentance, and transparency. Others felt the church should embrace EARM (heritage) moral conduct.

3.3.1.6.6 Prominent stakeholders

Kaja: Not aware.

Mobo: socio-ethical life should be led by the life and ministry of Jesus, more re-reading of the Bible in the light of the scientific discoveries of today. The leaders should be visionary and imaginative.
Mwda: Bishops should be transferrable to share their gifts with the whole Anglican Church of Kenya.

Hald: Anglican tradition concerns for the entire life should foster holistic discipleship and define whole life as Christ’s followers.

Ward: The Anglican Church should value its revival heritage, encourage new forms of spirituality among young people, while teaching the importance of worship and practices of the Anglican Church, and promote great flexibility and tolerance of different views. Church leaders should learn from Anglicans in other parts of the world to value sexual minorities.

Gago: this is a challenge because there is no true Anglican Church in Kenya. It combines elements of African culture, Pentecostalism, EARM but the mode of confession and testimony remains EARM. In the Kenyan ecclesiology, it remains rainbow spirituality.

Notations

They emphasized revival heritage, new forms of spirituality, encourage flexibility and tolerance, value sexual minorities, holistic discipleship, re-reading the Bible from the perspectives of scientific discoveries, visionary leaders, socio-ethics led by life and ministry of Jesus. They noted there is no pure Anglican Church in Kenya. Indeed the Anglican Church mode of confession and testimony is EARM/Pentecostalism with some elements of African culture.

3.3.1.7 Is there anything you would wish to share which has not been covered above?

Mugu: Brethren should set good moral examples

Kadu: A Social/economic gathering is not sinful. Some Brethren are wealthy, yet advocate for strict dressing code and hairstyle. This confuses people.

Kiro: no comment.

Kigi: that a convention theme trickles down to the local fellowship level.

Kaia: no leadership in the Fellowship, all are equal, and Christ is the chief priest. Marriage renewal is accepted.

Kima: we should avoid dishonesty; ask people to join fellowships and church should embrace Brethren. People should seek forgiveness before partaking of Holy Communion. Brethren should command respect as it was before.

Caal: EARM has relaxed legalism; ladies could attend fellowship without headscarf but does not allow dancing for the Lord in their forums.

Kigi: No comment.

Kagu: they follow a stereotypical fellowship liturgy in their meetings.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Kiya: everyone is welcome to the fellowship but must abide by its rules.

Caal: East Africa is not a movement but a fellowship. It is a fellowship of all Christians who confess Christ not just for Anglican. It has no registration list for its members.

Kaba: the fellowship is between you and God. You live well you are blessed. You go to God; he goes for you.

Baho: Brethren wishes clergy and youth would join them, should have a revival week, and respect EARM’s forums. Ministerial formation for clergy is not acceptable.

Kini: Brethren shouldn’t sacrifice their families for the convention. Their testimony should be reconciliatory. Brethren show God’s righteousness and should be smartly dressed. The Fellowship is united in Christ.

Muri: emphasis on righteousness and cleanliness. The clergy should support the EARM. Youth should return to the Fellowship.

Kigu: the clergy and theological students should join the Fellowship. Lecturers should follow-up students during mission outreaches. The students training for ministry should know it is a calling and not a job. The church should recognize Fellowships.

Kama: No Comment.

Notations
Brethren encouraged clergy and students to join the fellowship and that the Brethren should be recognized in the church (allow a revival week). However, Brethren were challenged to join social-economic groups while proper ministerial formation of clergy was encouraged.

Brethren never recognize church leaders but Christ. They have stereotypical fellowship liturgy. They need to emphasize constructive testimony. Indeed some Brethren have relaxed moral codes. But Fellowship has no denominational boundary and is not a movement and accepts marriage renewal. They have no membership list. They encourage preaching themes to trickle down from convention level.

Kaia: the Fellowship has a guiding text every month from District to local church level. They encourage gendered sitting arrangements. They have conventions every April for senior Brethren and youth, and mission at Lodwar every August. Monetary contribution (Gicunji kia Mwathani) in local churches caters for fellowships up to East Africa level. Every fellowship has its leaders or burden bearers (Akui a Murigo). They support dowry payment and weddings. Light is given from Kenya team down to the local church.

Kiro: leadership; no elections or age limit, leaders are referred to as burden bearers. At team meetings, they sit in a circle. Youth are encouraged to join the fellowship. Fellowship should be handled carefully because it can become a church within a church. EARM is the backbone of the Anglican Church in Kenya.

Kitu: EARM is the backbone of the Anglican Church, Convention monies comes from brethren. It can be a church within a church. Vicars and youth should be members.

Mugu: everyone needs a revival of heart. The only difference is what sin is and what isn’t. Brethren are encouraged to socialize.

Kigi: none

Kini: to harmonize EARM with the church to avoid what looks like a church within a church.

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Guse: Revival is not a faction within the church.

Otya: youth should be permitted to preach in the Fellowship. Also, allow dynamism in praising God.

Kahs: EARM should refocus on strengthening biblical knowledge and Christian witness to attract the younger generation.

Kima: to read a book by Dorothy “Salvation Concept then and now in EARM.” St Andrew’s College should address sin in its ministerial formation.

Caal: EARM encourages the same gender sitting arrangement and hugging.

Kagu: love everyone; St Andrew’s to teach clergy to be role models of salvation. The Spirit of God should lead Brethren.

Kigi: none.

Bah: St Andrew's student should join fellowship; God calls His people, including youth. There is need of the Holy Spirit guidance in the mission of the church.

Kini: there is need to encourage welfare groups where people contribute money to help each other, clergy to attend and support fellowship and allow them to participate in the Sunday services. People are encouraged to save in the bank and get loans.

Kigu: avoid jumble sales during fellowship as it hinders mission and encourages parents to counsel children against social evils.

Muri: Encourage local church fellowship and regional fellowships/conventions. Clergy should publicly confess sin to be relevant as God’s watchman.

Kama: Brethren to be members of church councils.

Notations

They emphasize gendered sitting arrangement, a monthly guiding text, harmony between EARM and the Anglican Church. EARM is the backbone of Anglican Church, and the Brethren contributes Gicunji kia Mwathani (portion of God’s money [convention money]). EARM is not a faction and should welcome clergy and youth. The concept of sin should be taught at St Andrew’s College Kabare.
3.3.1.7.3 Theological students

Allow accountability, change, socialization of different gender and age, and allow full participation in church activities.

Notations

Brethren should accept change, acceptance of others and accountability.

Kama: Nothing.

Muri: Emphasis righteous salvation and cleanliness in the church.

Dok: Revive the dying movement and entrench sound theology.

Kini: clergy should support Brethren. The former Archbishop Eliud Wabukala was a product of it. Factions like Kupaa (Rising up) still cause division. Brethren abhor socio-economic projects like loans etc. They have segregated themselves.

Kagu: involve bishops and clergy to end these divisions in the church.

Caal: Brethren search for marriage partners for their members.

Kahs: Anglican Church should support EARM and include them in the church programmes.

Mugu: none

Diocese of Mount Kenya West

Otya: give youth opportunities to preach in fellowships, accommodate them in the leadership of EARM and remove some radical stands like plaiting of hair.

Thuri: many to join the fellowship. It is not a movement.

Caal: EARM is a scholar’s terminology. It is a fellowship of the saved across denominations.

Caal: exploits the principle of Isaiah 1:18 to develop effective communication for an understanding of one another, sentimental values for the Christian faith, salvation, and service.

Kitu: allow integration of membership in the fellowship with other people.

Mugu: Brethren should allow jumping and singing/dancing for the Lord (David). It is biblical and not evil.

Notations

They should allow integrated fellowship and dynamic worship, and emphasis on proper communication (Isaiah 1:18). EARM is a fellowship (not a movement) across denominations. Clergy should incorporate Brethren in the preaching programme. Brethren should include youth in EARM’s leadership. Church leadership should end these divisions. Brethren assists eligible members in getting a marriage partner. They emphasize cleanliness and sound theology.

3.3.1.7.5 Bishops

Mount Kenya West

Brethren should not behave like a politician by attacking other Christians. Bishop Mahiani was almost chased away for associating with Uther (Light). You should say the time when you got saved and teach clergy to appreciate Brethren. Clergy should avoid being bearded. There should be oneness in Christ.

The EARM has its way of dealing with marriage issues. This should be considered and well-polished by the church.

Address ethical issues such as daughters cannot give birth at home, nurture those saved in school and appreciate youth. Work towards the informed interpretation of the Scripture.

Notations

Brethren should be tolerant with other people (oneness in Christ). Clergy should appreciate Brethren and avoid having a beard. The church should refine Brethren’s ways of conducting marriages, understand youth, address ethical issues and improve interpretation of scripture.
3.3.1.7.6 Prominent stakeholders

Gago: revival is critical in reshaping the post-colonial Kenya, Jomo Kenyatta a friend of Bishop Obadiah Kariuki, used “his forgive they don’t know what they do,” an echo from Christ, which is well propounded by EARM. In 1969 Bishop Kariuki confronted Kenyatta to stop humiliating church elders who were being stripped naked and forced to take the oath.

Wad: need to look at the relationship between the older Balokole movement and modern charismatic/Pentecostalism in the light of their thought and practice.

Hald: Great for African Anglican clergy interested in their history; this knowledge should strengthen the church and its witness to the nations of Africa and the wider world.

Mwda: Clergy, Bishops, and ACK Academics should devote time for fellowship with EARM groups in their areas, to influence and be influenced by real spiritual and theological growth in the church and EARM fellowship.

Mobo: Not Applicable

Kaja: Not Applicable

Notations

Revival re-shaped the post-colonial Kenya; compare thought and practice of the old Balokole and modern charismatic movements and Pentecostalism. This knowledge should strengthen the church and its witness. The church leadership and scholars should influence and be influenced by the revival.

As a recap, the notations that accrued from the recurrent responses across the categories were compared to get the most consistent bits or units of data from which the following themes were sorted. On the construction and analysis of these themes hinge the remaining section of this chapter, which begins with demographical information of the respondents.

3.3.2 Demographic data: Distribution of respondents according to their categories

Table 2 below summarizes the demographical representation of the respondents involved in the field study in the four selected Anglican dioceses of Mount Kenya Region. The representation includes some of the current theological students at St Andrew’s College of Theology and the prominent stakeholders within and outside the region. The information was gathered on various dates from April through July 2016.

Table 2: Demographical data
Table 2 shows that the biggest number of the participants was drawn from the ordinary members (75%) of EARM followed by the leaders (10%). Although categorized, the leaders are strongly intertwined and bonded with the ordinary members. The fact that these two categories comprise 85% of the total respondents elucidates the level at which this movement optimally operates.

The table 3 below shows the variant number of respondents in the four dioceses. On the higher side of the continuum, Kirinyaga Diocese scored 29%, followed by Embu and Mount Kenya Central at 27% and on the lower side, Mount Kenya West with 16%. This table suggests that while EARM in Kirinyaga, Embu and Mount Kenya Central dioceses is relatively thriving, in the Mount Kenya West, it appears to be nearer the end of its natural life.

The four categories in the above table plus theological students and prominent stakeholders make a total of six categories which will be used to construct themes which will guide this study.

3.3.3 Constructing themes

As suggested by the word 'construct,' qualitative research method of collecting data amassed detailed information that called for a particular analysis procedure. The process started with reading interview transcripts and field notes, as per the interview questions across the categories. The respondents’ views and perspectives were recorded with precise detailed accounts. These accounts were shifted and reduced into their most significant key elements referred by Merriam (2009:179) as analytical coding, which groups segments of accounts or comments/notes which appear to go together.

This coding technique argues Merriam (2009:180) extends beyond a description of data to interpretation and reflection on meaning. This was done in a twofold way: Firstly, the researcher rigorously sifted the details within the categories to establish the most consistent patterns or themes, which could have influenced Keswick theology on the EARM’s beliefs and practice of walking in the light. Secondly, the emerging key patterns or themes were systematically analyzed to reduce them into six themes and sub-themes that the researcher used to write the findings. These are Brethren’s born again testimony, acquaintances with EARM’s precursor, the daily sanctification of the new man, scripture and moral codes, splits and mission of Anglican Church of Kenya and synergized-diversified Anglican Church of Kenya.

3.3.3.1 Brethren’s born again testimony

The aspect of born again among the Brethren could not be authenticated by the members unless accompanied by a sequential testimony. Indeed, the question “describe the way you give a testimony” generated a lot of enthusiasm in all the four dioceses. The ordinary members and the leaders of the movement were mainly asked this question. The reasons were two-fold. Firstly, just like the pioneer revivalists Dr. Joe Church and Simeon Nsimambi, they were not theologians. Certainly, the majority were uneducated. Thus they faithfully carried on the teachings of how to say a testimony as it had been passed to them by the former revivalists’ leaders. Secondly, they shared an overwhelming and unique characteristic of asking for or giving testimony, which most often has not been familiar with the theologians.

The majority of the ordinary members gave their testimony in a three-fold way, almost a near uniformity across the four dioceses.

3.3.3.1.1 Full disclosure of identity

Brethren start their testimony by disclosing their full identity, saying where they came from, when they met with the Lord and what led to their conviction. For instance, a leader of EARM in Embu said “Christ saved me on April 29, 1967, at 3.00 A.M when drunk with alcohol... the specific sins that the Lord convicted me of I confessed and asked for his forgiveness...” an ordinary member of Mount Kenya West said, “I was born again on July 26, 1981. I don’t forget that day. Uria utakanyumbura guku ndikamumbura iguru, which literary means “But whoever disowns me before men, I will disown him before my Father in heaven” (Matt. 10:33). In this way, they seemed to identify with both God and humanity from the viewpoint of their heavenly and earthly relationships. They, therefore, appeared to claim the heritage of both realms; their identity is known and cannot be confused with any other. But a minority did not give a clear identity. A leader in Embu talked of overcoming with the word of testimony, defeating the devil and salvation from sin. This inconsistency could have been caused by the advanced age since the respondent was 83 years but still a recognized leader of the movement. No wonder the generation gap has continued to challenge the growth of the EARM.

3.3.3.1.2 Confession, restitution and forgiveness of sins

As indicated above Brethren repent and confess their past sins one by one followed by the restitution and forgiveness. A group of ordinary members in Mount Kenya West said they repent and confess in details all the sins they had previously committed. Where it was necessary to repay back what was stolen, they did so. Those who had avoided paying taxes went to the revenue authority to report themselves. If one had committed adultery he would go back to repent and guthondeka (make amends). In other words, to receive forgiveness, they brought to the light their past dark practices. Thus, restitution became a precursor for forgiveness.

Although done with good intention, some public testimonies had led to fallout within the Brethren, particularly when incriminating confessions leaked out to the non-Brethren. That’s notwithstanding an admission of adultery could break marriages whether the culprits were in the Fellowship or not. A woman lay leader in one of the dioceses suffered a lifelong blow when it emerged from a Brethren confession that she had had sex with him.
In spite of its negative side, a leader of EARM from Mount Kenya Central said public disclosure helps the believers to open up to each other, as they testify how the Lord has enabled them to overcome challenges in life.

3.3.3.1.3 Journey with the Lord Jesus

An ordinary member of EARM in Kirinyaga said that Brethren end their testimony by stating their sojourn with the Lord, affirming their growth in Christ every hour. Similarly, a leader from Mount Kenya West said, “You tell how the Lord is good, how he has sustained you, what he has done for you and how you have a daily walk with God.” Another leader from Kirinyaga said, “I briefly narrate what my Lord Jesus Christ has done for me so far. However, the way [of saying testimony] may vary with situations.” These responses seem to give a hint that informs the phrase walking in the light. Phrases like “every hour,” “how he has sustained you” and “what my Lord Jesus Christ has done for me so far” suggest a perfect tense, an ongoing process.

3.3.3.2 Acquaintances with EARM’s precursor

In order to put this theme into its proper perspective, it is vital to study the following statistics concerning respondents’ grip of Keswick theology. This will enable the reader to apprehend most of the respondents’ level of understanding of Keswick theology of sanctification and appreciate its influence in their daily life.

As the following figures indicate, the majority of the respondents had not heard about Keswick theology. Ordinary leaders: approx. 81.6%; Leaders: approx. 86%; Theological students: 100%; Clergy: approx. 66.6%; Bishops: Approx. 66.6% and the Stakeholders: 0%.

This shows that 80% (242) of the 302 respondents have never heard of Keswick theology. The table 4 below explicates this phenomenon per category.

The table 4 shows theological students were the most ignorant of the existence of Keswick theology. This might be due to two reasons. Firstly, most of them were young (in their 20s) and could be classified as not active members of the EARM. Though this study was not looking at the age of its members, it was quite clear from the responses that Brethren were mostly older adults. Secondly, it suggests that studies of the antecedents of “Keswick theology” have not been emphasized in the church history syllabus at St Andrew’s College where these students undertake their studies. This trend of ignorance has been replicated by the clergy and the bishops most of whom received their theological education at St Andrew’s College.

The ordinary members and the leader's score over 80% in terms of ignorance despite the fact that there has been a consensus that they are “the Brethren.” This is by being the majority adherents of the movement. The ignorance could be attributed, on the one hand to the historical distance between the Keswick movement and the current crop of Brethren. Indeed, although the Brethren shows keenness in mentioning the years they got saved, only one Leader from Embu could recall a 1969 Keswick meeting. On the other hand, African church historians might not have done serious studies that could have connected Keswick theology with EARM. Perhaps, if that had been done, a document could have been made available in a readable form for use by the ordinary members who are mostly uneducated.

By virtue of their academic pursuit and their Revival backgrounds, all the prominent stakeholders have heard about Keswick theology and its influence on the EARM’s beliefs and practices of walking in the light. Thus, concerning the 20% of those who have heard, the prominent stakeholders have a clean sheet of 100% knowledge of Keswick theology. Indeed out of the four dioceses, no one among the Kirinyaga ordinary members had any knowledge of Keswick influence on EARM. Likewise, no one among the Mount Kenya West leaders had any knowledge. As earlier mentioned, it is only one leader in Embu that had specific knowledge. Indeed his mention of the higher life movement was the clearest expression of the knowledge of Keswick theology among the categories except for the prominent stakeholders. Clergy too had some grip of this teaching. In the Mount Kenya central one respondent of the clergy said that sanctification is a great doctrine that holds EARM together while another one said it has molded EARM’s piety and setting itself apart from other Christians. But two clergy in Mount Kenya West confused it with the name of a Keswick Bookshop in Nairobi. This fact suggests the degree of ignorance by the clergy, let alone the ordinary Brethren. As seen in the second part of the following theme the majority of the respondents except the prominent stakeholders attributed other factors but Keswick to have influenced EARM.

3.3.3.3 Daily sanctification of the new man

The idea of experiential sanctification has been the bedrock of Keswick theology and somewhat flickers in the EARM’s everyday life. This has been done under two subthemes: Keswick and non-Keswick antecedents.

3.3.3.3.1 Daily sanctification as a Keswick antecedent

This theme brings to the fore respondents who have at least some knowledge of Keswick theology. Affirming the influence of Keswick teachings in the EARM, some Embu clergy described Keswick theology as a wave of revival and renewal over East Africa, explicated by profound salvation experiences almost similar to the prevailing situation in Kenya. Likewise, some stakeholders not only positioned it within the wider holiness movement but also emphasized conversion and personal faith exemplified by the infilling of the Holy Spirit, the purity of heart and body. Other stakeholders’ responded that Keswick teachings entrenched spirituality that became legalistic and prompted daily devotions and a profound sense of accountability. They also associated it with the strict pietistic theology of being saved and daily sanctification. Another stakeholder said it promoted a belief close to salvation by works other than by grace and faith in the resurrected Christ. All Bishops were unaware except one who could not recall its influence on EARM. This implies that unless some structures are put in place to salvage EARM, it could be approaching the end of its natural life in the Anglican Church of Kenya.
3.3.3.3.2 Daily sanctification as a non-Keswick antecedent

While the majority of the respondents cited other factors as the source of influence, there were some who supported both views of influence i.e., the Keswick and the non-Keswick antecedents. This fact had been cited in the historical survey earlier in this chapter by scholars like Ward (2006:175) who described “its roots in classical Evangelical revivalism and the Keswick movement of the late nineteenth century.”

This phenomenon characterizes the data findings of the prevailing situation in the Anglican Church of Kenya. In Kirinyaga an ordinary member of EARM said this spiritual influence came through church conventions, the study of the Word of God and confession of Christ. Indeed, conventions provide a platform for the spiritual nurture of the born-again Christians. Indeed a clergy from Mount Kenya West added that conventions were based on one major theme of walking in the light within the districts of its jurisdiction.

This nurture conforms them to a daily lifestyle. A leader in Kirinyaga adds that Brethren hate the sin, love God and look for help at the Cross. These teachings have become basic to the Brethren and undoubtedly influence their daily walk with the Lord. An ordinary member from Mount Kenya West said most of them lack knowledge of the meaning of the EARM and that led to set themselves apart from others to strictly follow Jesus’ teachings. This respondent appears to point out that their experiential holiness influences their distinct daily life.

A clergy member in the Mount Kenya West said the influence comes from a personal encounter with the Lord Jesus and the firm faith that resist sin. Others in Kirinyaga locate the influence to the conservative teaching. For instance, one of them said, “… elders of my church including my grandfather could camp at home for Kesha (an overnight meeting) and fellowships, preaching, sharing testimonies and encouraging one another. I was much attracted to this”. This acknowledgment seems to put the alternative source of influence in its right perspective. However, clergy from Mount Kenya Central has no knowledge of any alternative apart from Keswick. This might indicate that they were quite conversant with the history of EARM on the one hand and the other, they appeared insincere of the effects of the other spiritualities.

Some stakeholders said it was influenced by Pentecostalism and the born-again culture with the strict religious position. Other stakeholders attribute the influence to the Victorian ideals that advocate for sexual restraint, low tolerance to crime and a strict moral code. Still, others saw a lack of theological knowledge as a prelude to the belief and practice of walking in the light. This view was also expressed by a bishop and theological students who saw it as a consequence of literal interpretation of Scripture.
3.3.3.4 Scripture and moral codes

3.3.3.4.1 Scriptural verses that informs split

The majority of respondents used various biblical texts to describe the history of the divisions. The most mentioned texts were Ephesians 5:14 and Daniel 1:8ff at 16 and 14 times respectively. Others were 2 Cor.6:14-18 at 6, 1 Cor.11:14-16 at 6, Gen. 12.1 at 5, Ephesians 6:14-20 at 5, Romans 13:8 at 4 and Psalms 127:1 twice. These texts seemed to contribute most significantly to the development of some unique Brethren lifestyle. Understandably texts that scored a frequency of less than two were not tabulated in Table 5 below.

3.3.3.4.2 Interpretation of Scripture and ensuing moral life

The table 5 below shows the frequency and percentages of the key passages of scripture and their purported meaning that could have inspired splits in the EARM. Out of the eight most popular texts, Ephesians 5:14 was at the top end of the continuum while Psalms 127:1 was at the lower end. The disparity in frequency could be interpreted to mean their impact on the EARM's socio-ethical life was various. That is, interpretation of these texts could have informed subsequent divergent beliefs and practices of walking in the light. However, none of the texts garnered 50% of popularity which implied their influence could have been local and sporadic. It could also have meant that other factors apart from the interpretation of biblical texts could have influenced the splits. The table 5 shows how some biblical texts were interpreted and applied to impact various distinct socio-ethical lives.

As seen in the above table, most respondents who believe splits were brought by interpretation of Scripture mentioned the Ephesian text. Some ordinary members in Kirinyaga said the Ephesian passage led to Kufufuka (Arise) in 1967. The text was interpreted to mean they should leave the EARM. A leader in Mount Kenya Central said this text meant they had been raised from sins. They went on to say that Kufufuka members shared two testimonies. Firstly, they said when they were born again (saved) and secondly when they were raised or revived. This created two categories of Christians, the saved and the revived.

Some ordinary members from Embu said this split originated with William Nagenda, a leading lay evangelist from Baganda. In his sermons, Nagenda emphasized that resurrected Christians should avoid worldly involvement, particularly should refrain from taking bank loans. It required those who were saved to be saved again leading to the Awake (Kwarahuka or kuriuka) group. Similarly, a prominent stakeholder said this text is primary to the Abazukufu (Reawakened) which taught that those who continually confess sins after conversion were dead because they have no power of Spirit to overcome sin. Therefore, the ordinary Balokole were considered abafu (dead). This led to a formal split in 1972.

Some Kirinyaga leaders said the Daniel text was understood in 1969 to mean leaving EARM to form another group. Indeed, in 1987 some clergy from Mount Kenya West stated that this text was interpreted Mtama na Maji (sorghum and water) and led to a split from EARM in Kiambu.

(i) Ephesians 5:14 “Wake up, O sleeper, rise from the dead”

(ii) Daniel 1:8, 12 “But Daniel resolved not to defile himself with the royal food and wine, Give us nothing but vegetables and water to drink.”
Another member of the clergy in Mount Kenya Central said this text laid foundation for Kupaa (rising up). The text was used by the Kupaa group to refuse good food from the king's table and instead be served only with vegetables and water. Some Mount Kenya central leaders said the interpretation of the text made some Brethren to shun social gatherings where goodies were served.

Another clergy member in Mount Kenya Central said the Kupaa became the people of the light in Murang’a and based their belief on 1John 2:9-11, saying ithui nituonete utheri (ourselves, we have seen the light). It thus came to be called Ngwataniro ya utheri (Fellowship of the light) based on Matt. 5:14. They accept greetings, “praise the Lord.” They do not allow weddings of expectant girls or renewal of marriages. The third offshoot from Kupaa came to be called the Revival Fellowship which believes in walking in the light.

One of the leaders in Kirinyaga said this Kupaa group settled for a simple life. For example, their weddings have no wedding cake, and the bride wears a simple wedding dress. This is complemented by a leader from Embu who said the Kupaa group was against earthy influence (extravagance lifestyle).

(iii) 1 Cor. 11:14-16 “…If a man has long hair, it is a disgrace to him, but if a woman has long hair, it is her glory… long hair is given to her as covering.”

This text was interpreted by Kirinyaga leaders to mean that men should not keep beards and women should cover their heads. As a result members of EARM do not have beards and women either cover or shave their heads. This has become the norm whether inside the church or outside. Truly, a clergy member from Mount Kenya Central used 1 Cor. 11:5 to indicate that women should cover their heads while praying. Thus, a clergy member from Mount Kenya West termed issues of long hair and short hair as a dressing code.

(iv) 2 Cor. 6:14-17 “Do not be yoked together with unbelievers...Therefore come out from them and be separate, says the Lord.”

The part two of this text was quoted more frequently than part one. This is perhaps due to its seemingly clear intent to separate the righteous from the sinners. Thus some ordinary members in Kirinyaga and Mount Kenya Central responded favourably to this text. A prominent stakeholder also mentioned this text. Some Brethren have used it to hedge themselves from the rest of Christian community, perceived to be living in sin. This has entrenched the holier than thou attitude. However the first part of the text “Do not be yoked together with unbelievers” didn’t attract as many respondents. Indeed, only a clergy member in Kirinyaga mentioned it. This shows the crux of the verse to have been the second part, maybe due to its forthright declaration of setting apart the believers from the unbelievers.
(v) Eph.6:14-20 particularly vs. 14 “stand firm.”

The respondents were emphatic with verse 14, ‘stand firm’. Mount Kenya central and Embu leaders said that this text was used by Kusimama “standing up” group to encourage Christians to withstand challenges. Indeed, Kusimama group has been noted for the utilization of the phrase Yesu atosha (Jesus satisfies). Some ordinary members in Embu said that Kusimama group was formed when some Brethren disagreed with Kufufuka campaign and saw nothing wrong with having bank loans to improve their welfare. This disagreement led to separate meetings that saw Nthama (Embu word for Exodus) faction spring up in Nairobi in 1956. They regarded traditional/nicknames to be sin and identified themselves with Kuhama (Exodus/leave) group. Thus, the Kufufuka backlash led to Kusimama (Stand) and Kuhama. The connotation of Kuhama leans towards leaving, as to depart, in this case leaving Kusimama and Kufufuka. This brought to the fore a series of splits within the EARM.

(vi) Genesis 12:1 “Leave your family, your people and your father’s household…”

The Kirinyaga leaders said some Brethren after reading this text sold everything they had and ‘physically’ left their families to serve God in distant places. Theological students referred to this group as Thama, a Gikuyu word for leave/exodus. Although the origin of the term Thama is distinct from Kuhama mentioned above, the two complement each other in emphasis. Mount Kenya central leaders said the interpretation of this text led some parents to desert their unwed pregnant daughters and would not even attend their weddings. The same parent would attend the wedding of a daughter that married while not pregnant. This discrimination led to family feuds.

(vii) Psalms 127:1 “unless the Lord watches over the city, the watchmen stand guard in vain.”

Indeed Blasio Kigozi could have read this text when he slept soundly in a makeshift shelter well aware a leopard was lurking in the dark (Guillebaud, 2002:57). Thus some of the Kirinyaga leaders said this text was used in a Uganda Convention, where it was emphasized that God was the protector and so there was no need of seeking any other form of security, for example keeping dogs. Likewise, leaders in Embu said Brethren in Uganda refused to visit their colleague called Matofu because he kept dogs. The dogs came to be regarded as a sin, and some were killed.

The Kirinyaga leaders said this text was viewed through the same lens that expressed intolerance of unwedded pregnant daughters and keeping dogs. Honestly one of the stakeholders commented in Kiswahili, Tusiwe na deni (we should not have debt). The text could have led to split as some Brethren saw no problem with taking bank loans. This could be one of the reasons why the majority of Brethren have been economically poor. Indeed, in Embu, one of the leaders said that in the 1970s there were social and economic problems that challenged taking loans because of inability to pay back. Another leader from Embu said members were asked to refrain from a bank loan.

3.3.3.4.3 Other causes of splits

As mentioned earlier, the majority of the respondents either associated splits with other factors while the remaining ones had no idea. The other factors included leadership and open confession of sin.

(i) Leadership

The majority of the respondents who said other factors contributed to the splits believed strong personality and leadership disaffection were the primary causes. One of the prominent stakeholders said some Brethren who were retired teachers imposed themselves too firmly leading to isolating other members.

Thus, most of the Bishops said splits were occasioned by personal differences and social lifestyles. Indeed, one of them pointed at the dressing code and shaving of hair as the essential elements that led to the emergence of Utheri (walking in the light) group.

One of the prominent stakeholders said Brethren’s habit of attacking clergy as not saved weakened the Brethren's bargaining power in the church. For example, they dismissed one of the early church founders in Kirinyaga as not saved for sniffing tobacco. No wonder, another prominent stakeholder observed that Balokole movement has always been at loggerheads with what they referred to as the 'nominal' church.

Some clergy in Embu said EARM had been opposed to the Anglican Church hierarchy and had conflicted with bishops. Indeed one of the prominent stakeholders stated that Revivalists acknowledged their leader to be the Holy Spirit. Thus a lack of theological training had led to misunderstanding and the eventual split. Some Embu ordinary members expressed similar sentiments and added that leadership dispute resulted in the beginning of some of the new denominations.

A prominent member of revival said one of the social, ethical issues that brought split between Joremo (people of blood) and Johera (people of love) was the question of polygamy. Johera argued that polygamists were honest men and should be loved and accepted, but the True Anglicans who were strict or hypocritical did not want them near.

Apart from the church’s hierarchy conflict, Embu leaders said there were divisions in the fellowship too. Some held their fellowship meetings in their homes while others were held in the church. Also, leaders in Embu said fighting for leadership positions had led to some members starting their own churches. Undoubtedly, splits could give rise to a new congregation as expressed by some Mount Kenya West leaders who said that some fellowship leaders were also members of the church leadership. This meant they had their followers in the church. So their divisions caused wrangles attributed by what some Mount Kenya central leaders termed as unequal recognition of members.

(ii) Open confession of sin

Some Embu leaders said repenting and confession of sin could have led to dissension especially when someone was forced to repent sins the person doesn't even know. Again, before somebody was admitted as a member of EARM, one was required to promise before God and the assembled congregation (publicly) that one has left sin. This led to some leaving the movement due to the stigma that mostly accompanied confessions. Also, some leaders of Mount Kenya Central argued that Brethren sidelined anybody perceived not to walk in the light (not confessing sin). Some ordinary members of Mount Kenya central attributed the division to not only the lack of openness but Brethren's doubt of other people’s salvation. This brought enmity/mistrust within the Brethren and with other Christians. Thus, some Kirinyaga clergy said shedding of too much light, about open confession, brought division. This could be what some ordinary members in Kirinyaga termed as damaging testimony that led some Brethren to disagree with their vicar.

Some Embu ordinary members said division within the revival began in 1969 when two lights arose; one acknowledged open confession of sins and the other did not. After 1970 deep lights were discouraged because they brought mistrust among the members. Some of these lights or testimonies acted as codes of ethics that were used to address the dressing code and hairstyle.

The administration of the 1969 oath also brought some division as was expressed by some of the Mount Kenya central leaders. Those found culpable left the movement and some joined Pentecostal churches. The practice of open confession was termed hypocritical by some Kirinyaga clergy and some ordinary members of Mount Kenya central. Thus, some leaders in Mount Kenya Central added that Brethren did not appreciate a public address system (loud music) claiming praying loudly and speaking in tongues were sinful. This affected the youth, and some left the church.
3.3.3.5 Effects of splits on the Mission of Anglican Church in Kenya

As seen above, splits within the EARM led to some factions. Each group had its slogan, mostly drawn from a scriptural text. Most of these slogans resulted in the formulation of ethical rules of conduct befitting the catchphrases. For instance, Thama was applied physically by a Brethren in Kirinyaga who left his unsaved family to witness for Christ in Nairobi (a faraway country). So the question of the effect of the split on the mission of the church evoked varied reactions from the respondents which could be classified into several sub-themes.

3.3.3.5.1 Evangelism and Witness

A prominent stakeholder said that Evangelical/Revivalists have often been at the heart of church-sponsored mission activities and on a personal level evangelism. However, another stakeholder said EARM remained like an opposition party within a church assassinating one another while hiding under walking in the light. Still another one stated that splits compromised real witness of the Brethren all over East Africa. Thus, some ordinary members in Mount Kenya Central said the fact that Brethren view themselves as the holier than thou impedes the church mission. Others in the same diocese blamed the way Brethren say their testimony or shares lights (walking in light), that exposed somebody’s private life. This affects church witness and growth of the mission because many Christians see testimonies as an intrusion into their lives and an attempt to portray unequal standing with other Christians.

Some leaders in Embu said split did not only weaken EARM's unity and slowed its witness spirit but failed to witness to the church with each defending its theological stand. Others stated that in the 1960s there was a lapse in holiness and witnessing Spirit. This was due to strict moral codes like refraining from a bank loan and getting saved anew, which led to separate fellowship meetings. But ordinary members in Kirinyaga, said in the 1970s, splits impacted the mission of the church positively with smart dressing codes and preaching from the Bible. Thus, some clergy in Mount Kenya West said competing interests of different groups affected the mission. Young people were most affected, and many left the Fellowship leading to the declining morals in the church.

3.3.3.5.2 A Pentecostal haven

Pentecostal influence in the Anglican Church in Kenya has resulted in outsiders confusing Brethren identity of born again with that of the mushrooming Pentecostal churches. Some disgruntled Christians found their haven here. One of the prominent stakeholders stated that youth joined Pentecostal churches where they could fully exercise their gifts. Some of the Mount Kenya central leaders said some people went to Pentecostal churches because of the strict moral code. They further said that in the 1990s youth left the church not just because of their hair, makeup, dressing code, and use of Public address system but because the Brethren did not tolerate Pentecostal worship in the Anglican Church. Thus Kirinyaga leaders said the split has led to new fellowships and new denominations, a fact shared by one of the Bishops.

Again abandonment of unwedded pregnant daughters by their Brethren parents led to a further exodus of young people from the church. Kirinyaga ordinary leaders said young people declined to join the fellowships, citing lack of motivation. Some clergy from Mount Kenya Central said this brought a cloud of confusion and lack of synergy for the church’s growth.

3.3.3.5.3 Disenfranchised church mission

Undoubtedly, splits led to a disenfranchised church mission due to lack of openness and doubt of others’ salvation. Leaders in Mount Kenya West said EARM separates themselves from others (sinners), but Jesus came for such, not the righteous and this affected church mission. Thus some ordinary members from Mount Kenya Central said this brought enmity/mistrust among Brethren and with other Christians, particularly clergy, who were irked for being asked to get saved. One of the prominent stakeholders recently said that EARM saw itself as the legislators of the church with the majority of Anglican bishops claiming to be part of the revival. This could have been a big boost for the church mission if the declaration was not halfhearted, as to appear schizophrenic in faith as claimed by a prominent stakeholder.

Some of the Kirinyaga ordinary members saw no reciprocity between Brethren support for church activities and church support for Brethren activities. This deadlock has led to a lack of brokenness at the cross of Christ and affected the church mission. Some members of Mount Kenya Central said Brethren had been members of the church though governed by distinct rules of conduct. One of the Bishops said this strained relationships and affected conventions, while another one noted the split led to church growth as a splinter group bought a plot and built a church.

3.3.3.6 Synergized-diversified Anglican Church in Kenya

Most respondents expressed the need for an all-inclusive and diversified church that allows reciprocating dynamics of different facets of church ministry and mission.

3.3.3.6.1 Leadership

About inclusion of Brethren in leadership, one of the prominent stakeholders said EARM was critical in reshaping the post-colonial Kenya. Jomo Kenyatta, a friend of Bishop Obadiah Kariuki, used to say “forgive, they don’t know what they do,” a phrase which has been well propounded in the EARM. Indeed, in 1969 Bishop Kariuki, a member of EARM, confronted Kenyatta to stop humiliating church elders who were being stripped naked and forced to take the oath. Thus the bishop and the Brethren seemed to read from the same script. This shows mutual coexistence between the church leadership and the Brethren which enabled them to fight injustices.

Indeed, another Bishop said the church should address ethical issues surrounding unmarried daughters who were not allowed to give birth at home. He also said Brethren should work towards the informed interpretation of the Scripture, appreciate and nurture youth to Christian maturity. Another bishop stated that Brethren should not behave like politicians by attacking other Christians. He said Bishop Mahiani had almost been chased away for associating with the utheri (light) splinter group. Thus it seems like Bishops have been instrumental in the running of the Revival. On the one hand, some clergy in Kirinyaga said the retired Archbishop of the Anglican Church of Kenya, Dr. Eliud Wabukala, was a product of the Revival movement. So, as expressed by the Embu clergy and Kirinyaga ordinary members, the Anglican Church should support EARM and include them in the church [preaching] programmes. Kirinyaga ordinary members and Leaders respectively said that priests should provide mentorship for Brethren and youth and that Brethren should be members of church councils. On the other hand, Embu ordinary members felt that Brethren should also be good mentors for young people and clergy.

Thus, some Embu clergy said that bishops and clergy should end divisions in the church. This could be done, says some Mount Kenya Central clergy, by preaching and teaching the unity of purpose based on Ephesians chapter 4 (one God, one Spirit, and one hope). Thus, some of the Mount Kenya Central clergy voiced a need for EARM and the Anglican Church to work together to fight the devil, not each other.

At the one end of the range, some Embu leaders’ said clergy and Brethren should have one Fellowship Sunday every month. At the other end, the clergy was encouraged to walk in the light and to teach salvation. This aspect of inclusive fellowship was also advocated by the ordinary members in Kirinyaga, who said Brethren wished to have a revival week that would incorporate clergy, theological students, and youth. Thus, Mount Kenya West clergy and leaders said youth should not only be accommodated in the leadership of EARM but also given opportunities to preach in the Fellowships.

A group of ordinary members in Mount Kenya Central was of the view that there should be changes in the Revival leadership. This is in spite of the fact that Brethren claimed they have no leaders in Fellowship because all are equal and Christ is the chief priest. In this diocese, the leaders of the movement said EARM does not have elective positions and no age limit. EARM leaders are referred to as burden bearers. During team meetings, they sit in a circle, united in Christ, maybe signifying they were among equals. But paradoxically they accept titled leaders of Fellowship. However, a leader in Embu said a circular sitting arrangement in fellowship meetings is necessary because it appreciates positive values of African heritage. Although this could be an adaptation of the Gikuyu council of elders, the only difference was that Gikuyu had senior elders called chiefs.

A group of the Kirinyaga ordinary members said local church fellowships, regional fellowships and conventions should be encouraged. A member of Mt Kenya central leaders said monetary contributions fondly called Gicunji kia Mwathani (the Lord’s portion) in the local churches cater for team fellowships up to East Africa level.

But they advised Brethren should not sacrifice their families to attend conventions referred to by a section of Embu ordinary members as stereotypical. That is, during these forums they follow a certain legalistic liturgy. A leader in Mount Kenya Central said they have conventions every April for senior Brethren and also for youth, and a mission every August. Another leader in this diocese said the Fellowship has a guiding biblical text every month from District to local church level. Thus a group of ordinary members in Mount Kenya Central stated that EARM should be handled carefully. This is because it is the backbone of the Anglican Church in Kenya, it could become a church within a church.

3.3.3.6.2 Moral code dynamism

Issues of moral code had more to do with the dressing system. A group of ordinary members from Embu said Brethren should accommodate fashion norms. They should not insist that women should dress according to St Paul’s instructions in 1 Timothy 2:9-15. The group argued that Paul’s instructions were valuable for the principles they specify, rather than for the specific instructions. They said the principle, in this case, is that one should not overdress in public. They argued that this law should apply to men as well.

So, the church and the Fellowship should not make rules which appear burdensome for any sector of the congregation. They should avoid what looks like micromanaging some segments of the congregation like youth. One of the groups of ordinary members in Mount Kenya central expressed a need for EARM to embrace change. Brethren should avoid legalistic rules that hinder young people from joining the Fellowship. Thus, a leader in Embu and a group of Kirinyaga ordinary members said Brethren should relax the dressing style, and the Embu leader adds that women should preach with or without a headscarf. Certainly, Mount Kenya West clergy was emphatic on ignoring some radical stands like plaiting of hair.

Group of ordinary members in Embu said those in authority consider it their right to shape the opinions of young people. The EARM should know the church needs the youth for its survival. The young people accused the Fellowship of being too restrictive and exclusive. Some have left because they found the norms of conduct too tied to the interest of the older members. Indeed, some unmarried Brethren have complained of interference in their choice of marriage partners. They quoted Galatians 5:1 “it is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm then and do not let yourself be burdened again by a yoke of slavery.” So no individual should burden another because of issues of faith. For example, Brethren should not challenge clergy to publicly confess sin if they were to be relevant as God’s watchman.

Indeed, Kirinyaga ordinary members said a testimony should not be a measure of personal salvation rather it should glorify God. They observed that Brethren should avoid rigid fellowship rules and instead rely on God’s word. Thus, one of the Kirinyaga leaders said that the word of God should guide the converts, not socio-ethical rules.

A clergy member in Embu said people should dress decently and believers should walk as per their confession, while another from Mount Kenya West said everybody should be saved but confess sins to God alone. A group of ordinary members in Kirinyaga said there should be proper handling of the neophytes to avoid their leaving the Fellowship. Thus, a cleric from Embu argued that Brethren should revisit public relations to deal with issues of dressing code and morality. Indeed, a prominent stakeholder said the Anglican Church should encourage great flexibility and tolerance of different views. This respondent insisted that church leaders should learn from Anglicans in other parts of the world to value sexual minorities and to encourage the decriminalization of the old colonial sodomy laws.

However, some Kirinyaga ordinary members seemed retrogressive in their argument that people should observe gender rules of dressing and hairstyle. They said men behave like animals; girls should not go near them. They also said men should not wear earrings and necklaces. Women should either wear short hair or headscarf and should loathe decoration. Thus one of the Bishops said the church should emulate EARM’s strict ethics like the shaving of the beard and at the same time bring people to church. Another bishop said the church should uphold EARM’s heritage of addressing sin but allowing change. Thus, some Brethren wants the status quo. So, as a Kirinyaga clergyman argues there is a need to strike a balance between nominalism and a holier than thou attitude.

3.3.3.6.3 Worship (in the Spirit) dynamics

In order to accommodate everyone and especially youth, theological students expressed a need for dynamism in the Fellowship. Thus theological students together with some Mount Kenya West clergy said there should be full participation of all ages in church departmental activities. Indeed, Embu ordinary members felt that hugging of the opposite sex particularly by the young people should be allowed.
Thus some Embu clergy and a leader in Mount Kenya West said to worship God in the truth and the Spirit, there is a need to recognize the ministry of the Holy Spirit in the church. A section of Mount Kenya Central clergy added that Brethren should allow jumping, singing and dancing for the Lord because it is biblical, not evil. Furthermore, a clergy member from Embu said to bring harmony and growth of the church in the Spirit; Brethren should carefully handle the Scripture.

One of the prominent stakeholders argued that Bishops should be transferrable to share their gifts with the whole Anglican Church of Kenya. The issue of transferring bishops has been there for decades but has never been implemented, may be due to fears of the unknown, but a significant agenda for the Anglican Church of Kenya. Another stakeholder argued that in spite of the fact that the mode of confession and testimony remains EARM, there is no pure Anglican Church in Kenya. This is because the church appears to have combined elements of African culture, Pentecostalism and, or EARM. Thus in the Kenyan ecclesiology, remains a rainbow spirituality, meaning that the church is losing its tradition.

However, another stakeholder said that Anglican tradition has always expressed concern for the whole life, in part because of its unique history as a church for the nation. He believes discipleship is holistic, committed to living as a Christ follower in ways that define the whole life. Another stakeholder expressed a need to look at the relationship between the older Balokole movement and modern charismatic/Pentecostalism in the light of their thought and practice. This is because the earlier EARM was founded within the context of the overwhelming power of the Holy Spirit, which appears to anchor proliferation of Pentecostal churches today. Thus a group of Embu ordinary members encouraged the Fellowship members to revert to the former Brethren lifestyle. A leader in Embu inspired spiritual renaissance to address negative socio-ethical issues such as corruption in Kenya.

A prominent stakeholder adds that Anglican Church should value its revival heritage; encourage new forms of spirituality among young people, while teaching the importance of worship and practices of the Anglican Church. Thus a cleric in Mount Kenya central requested EARM to be less conservative and accept the leadership of the Spirit of God.

3.3.3.6.4 Twenty-first century church academics

In order to improve the current socio-ethical life, the respondents' raised two pertinent issues.

(i) Ministerial formation of clergy

A prominent stakeholder appeared ecstatic that African Anglican clergy were getting interested in their history. He said that this knowledge should strengthen the church and its witness to the nations of Africa and the wider world. Another one encouraged clergy, bishops and ACK Academics like the researcher, to devote time for fellowship with East Africa Revival groups in their areas, to influence and be influenced by real spiritual and theological growth in the Church and East Africa Revival Fellowship.

However, a group of ordinary members in Kirinyaga pointed out that ministerial formation for clergy has not been good. The other group urged lecturers to follow-up students during mission outreaches to correct and rebuke any unruly behaviour. The students training for ministry should know it is a calling, not a job. Thus some leaders in Embu said theological colleges like St. Andrew's Kabare in Kenya should address sin in its ministerial formation of theological students. This should enable clergy to be good role models of salvation.

(ii) Reading the Bible in the 21st century

Some leaders in Mount Kenya central expressed a need for Brethren to embrace the 21st-century cultural changes. A prominent stakeholder said there should be more re-reading of the Bible in the light of the scientific discoveries of today. The stakeholder said the life and ministry of Jesus should inspire a church leader’s visionary and imaginative socio-ethical life. But some leaders in Embu cautioned that the Brethren should not use the New Testament as an instruction manual for norms and overly burdensome instructions. The Church should refocus on strengthening biblical knowledge and Christian witness to attract the younger generation.

Thus, some Kirinyaga clergy voiced a need for special workshops for believers on spirituality. A leader in Embu said Brethren do not only need preaching lessons but also how to use lectionary readings in their sermon preparation. Furthermore, theological students argued that Brethren should learn proper exegesis and interpretation of the Bible. Certainly, as observed by a Kirinyaga cleric, this could be one way to entrench sound theology to revive the dying movement. Likewise, a clergy member in Mount Kenya Central said the church should exploit the principle of Isaiah 1:18. This would help to develop effective communication for an understanding of one another’s sentimental values for Christian living and service.

3.3.3.6.5 Social-economic activities

Groups of ordinary members in Mount Kenya Central said Brethren should model biblical teachings on economic activities and embrace a changed social life. They were also asked to be sensitive to what they say at social gatherings to avoid fallout. Thus another group of ordinary members in Mount Kenya central argued that formation of socio-economic groups to assist other people is not sinful. Helping the needy is biblical (1John 3:17-18). Indeed some Brethren are wealthy and for them to discredit socio-economic actions confuse people. A leader in Kirinyaga asked Brethren to avoid self-centredness and help the less fortunate to harness unity.
A leader in Mount Kenya Central said Brethren should avoid conservativeness and should not compare the 1930s or 1950s salvation standards with todays. The respondent urged Brethren to consider joining a self-help social group. Another leader said while Brethren address the dressing code and morality they should engage in economic activities. A Kirinyaga leader added that there is need to encourage welfare groups, where people contribute money to help each other. This respondent also urged opening a saving account in the bank to get loans. But a Kirinyaga clergy member observes that Brethren abhor socio-economic projects such as bank loans.

3.4 CONCLUSION

This chapter focused on the Anglican Church scholarship perspective on Keswick theology as propagated by scholars of Anglican or non-Anglican Church origin. The task incorporated an overview of the Anglican scholarship from the viewpoint of historical literature and documents on the one hand, and the findings and the analysis of the current situation on the other. It is divided into four parts. Part 1 introduced issues that provided a platform for engaging and investigating the existing historical nature of church scholarship. It also brought to the fore the current situation of the influence of Keswick theology on EARM socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light in the light of the Anglican Church Mount Kenya region.

Part 2 discussed a historical overview of the Anglican Church Scholarship on Keswick theology’s influence on EARM’s walking in the light. This section offered a new historical summary of the nature and influence of the Anglican Church scholarship on the emerging socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light and suggested a viable perception.

It also dealt with the Anglican Church scholarship concerning historical literature and documents. A highlight of the main scholars served to assess credibility and authenticity of the summarized history of the genesis and spread of the revival to Kenya.

Part 3 discussed nature and current trends regarding Anglican Church scholarship on Keswick theology influence on EARM’s walking in the light: findings and analyses of the prevailing situation.

This part analyzed the data collected from oral and email interviews. Based on the findings, the study assessed the nature and current status with respect to the influence of Keswick theology on walking in the light. The study used qualitative approaches and conducted self-administered/email interviews on the EARM’s leadership, ordinary membership, theological students, clergy, bishops and the prominent stakeholders. This part comprised various sections, which examined issues ranging from demographic distribution of respondents to understanding of the Anglican Church scholarship on the influence of Keswick theology in EARM’s concept of walking in the light in Mount Kenya region. Following this it is vital to investigate the rudimentary missiological principles with the view to giving missiological viewpoints on the prevailing trends.
CHAPTER 4. PREVAILING BASIC MISSIOLOGICAL TENETS AND PRACTICES OF WALKING IN LIGHT

4.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter focuses on the basic missiological tenets and practices of walking in the light. The scope incorporates, on the one hand, interpretation of the central biblical texts, which appear to have contributed to the prevailing situation. On the other hand, it debunks evangelical Anglican tradition with respect to placing missiological viewpoints into the right perspective in this study. It is divided into seven parts. Firstly, it introduces the chapter as a whole; secondly, it brings to the fore the basic missiological tenets that provide a platform to analyze the prevailing practices of walking in the light. Thirdly, it interprets some of the key biblical texts to give historical-missiological perspectives on the current situation. Fourthly, the chapter attempts to explicate evangelical Anglican tradition which will hinge the missiological foundations needed to critique specific tenets of the prevailing model of walking in light in EARM. Fifthly and sixthly, the chapter will not only inform the researcher’s theoretical framework to analyze scriptural teachings related to sanctification but also, culminate in a new EARM’s model of the theology of sanctification. Finally, the chapter offers a conclusion.

4.2 BASIC MISSIOLOGICAL TENETS THAT PROVIDE A PLATFORM TO ANALYZE THE PREVAILING PRACTICES OF WALKING IN THE LIGHT.

Although missiological studies have numerous tenets/principles, the researcher’s focus is on the ones that appear pivotal to this work. These are; incarnational, cross-centred, centripetal-centrifugal, missio-logoi, and missio Dei, which apparently seem to inform and complement each other. These principles attempt to analyze the current beliefs and practices of walking in light in the EARM.

As per the research findings conducted in early 2016, the following beliefs and practices, which are clustered into three categories, were found to be prevalent. Firstly, the born-again testimony that incorporates confession of sin, and daily victory/sanctification. Secondly, worship in spirit dynamics, and Pentecostal haven, and finally, Scripture and moral codes. These will be analyzed through the eyes of each of the ensuing five missiological principles.

Certainly, the incarnation is a fundamental model of mission as it compels God to descend to the level of his creatures in becoming one with humanity. Athanasius (1977:29) explicates reason for this mysterious habituation: “it was our sorry case that caused the Word to come down, our transgression that called out His love for us so that He made haste to help us and to appear among us. It is we who were the cause of His taking human form, and for our salvation that in His great love He was both born and manifested in a human body. While Athanasius seems to expound John 1:14. “The word became flesh and dwelt among us”, he further appears to echo the words of Paul to the Philippians 2:6-8: “Christ Jesus, though in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant… and being found in human form, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on the cross.” This, observes Galgalo (2012:34), demonstrates Christ is relinquishing his “divine attributes in order to identify himself with humanity”. It is with this regard that Jesus could accomplish the intended mission which culminated in his crucifixion. This action of God is not only incarnational, but kenotic, and is rooted in the mission of God. Going by this understanding, it suffices to say that incarnation is at the pinnacle of God’s prototypical love and grace, which goes to the heart of God’s mission to the world (Galgalo, 2012:33). In a practical sense, by becoming human God entered into a special relationship with humanity. This integration of humanity with the divine nature of Christ looks like what Tizon (2008:155) calls missionary engagement with the local community, and so, places contextual faith in its proper perspective. This is echoed by Hiebert and Meneses (1995:371), who contend that incarnation serves as a model for human relationships, arguing that missionaries should not only identify with the people they serve but also adopt their lifestyle as a way of building trust and acceptance. Hiebert and Meneses further raise a profound point that “just as Christ remained fully God when he took human form, so the scripture remains divine revelation even when it is written in different languages… No other act of the missionary empowers people and dignifies their culture more than Bible translation. It takes people seriously and says to them that God speaks their language”. Thus, since language gives words and meaning to people's worldview, the translation must be precisely and meticulously applied to the context. Following this, it is critical for the incarnate missionary to work towards Godly driven missionary task noting that God is already incarnate among people before the arrival of the missionary. This suggests that mission of God does not follow the missionary, but the missionary follows or participates in the missio-Dei. God is already ahead preparing the hearts of the local people to receive the transforming word of God through the power of the Christ crucified (Hiebert and Meneses, 1995:373). In addition, missionaries must admit they are still socio-cultural outsiders sent by Christ to announce the good news of salvation. So, the indigenous people would surely expect missionaries to show all manner of respect to the local population's worldview. Thus, missionaries’ entry into the local indigenous context should, therefore, portray peaceful and cross-centred missionary intentions. Indeed, this understanding of incarnational mission could serve as a measuring rod, to analyze beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

4.2.1.1 Born again testimony

A born again testimony, which describes Brethren journey with the Lord Jesus, starts when a person accepts Jesus as Lord and Saviour. He or she declares to leave behind worldly amusements, to cling to Jesus, in what Brethren call in Kikuyu, kuhikira mwathani (married to the Lord). By this action, they are expected to shun all evil activities. Thus, Langley and Kiggins (1974:192) elaborated a born-again experience by a carpenter during a Uganda convention in 1945:

“At their feet was a fire in which burned two native harps. Jeremiah, a senior carpenter, had been saved and had called his friends to witness the burning of things which he had used in his drinking bouts. ‘I used to work well’, he said, ‘during the daytime, but as soon as the sun goes down I turned into another man. I became a demon. I drank, shouted, sang and abused people, playing heathen tunes on my native harps, often drunk... So I have burned the harps and my past. The devil has gone out. The Lord Jesus has come in!”

The phrase, the devil has gone out, and the Lord Jesus has come in describe a situation akin to a spectacular transformation from an ordinary Christian to a saved Jeremiah. He now has Jesus in his life. Note the senior carpenter referred to here had a baptismal name, but that, to Brethren didn’t matter. A public confession has to be done heralding a moral transformation. This is consonant with Keswick teachings of ‘Let go’ and ‘Let God.’ In other words, Jeremiah gave up everything, so that, as they believe, Christ incarnate, at that very moment enters into his life. This is a typically born-again story by Brethren across Kenya today.

As far as EARM’s was concerned, Jeremiah had not been saved until he had burned his past evil practices. Indeed, in one of the interviews carried out by the researcher in April 2016, it came to the fore that to be born again, one had to mention evil things or sins committed in the earlier life, and make the necessary restitution as a precursor for forgiveness. Although public confession of immoral practices has been discouraged, one would still be expected to follow a three-fold way of saying a testimony. That is, declaration of one’s status in the past (before being born again), present walk with the Lord, and future expectations from God, in that order. That’s a prototype testimony from a Brother. Following this, it would seem like incarnational mission would replicate a guided way of appropriating salvation to the local community.

Thus, born-again experiences naturally points to a particular routine, declaring victory over sin through daily sanctification, or daily walk with Jesus, who they believe lives in their souls. This kind of testimony is a common feature during Brethren Fellowship meetings. In such meetings, a neophyte is welcomed to an exclusive caring group of believers, who show distinct love for one other.

4.2.1.2 Spirit dynamism

The incarnate Brethren Christian seems to believe in the gifts of the Holy Spirit, but with a noteworthy reservation to Spirit dynamism in worship. Indeed, any serious Brother would neither dance in worship nor entertain powerful musical instruments. This can be a challenge for the incarnate ministries conducted by Brethren in a multi-dynamic and open society. Thus, most young people and even relatively older ones seem to prefer charismatic worship sessions in the Anglican service. This scenario has led to a proliferation of Pentecostal churches, which are perceived to allow spirit dynamism, and indeed, have encroached on most mainstream Protestant churches in Kenya.

4.2.1.3 Moral codes

Since Brethren read and uphold literal teachings of scripture, challenges of scripture related to legalism challenges, have been inevitable. Thus, the church’s incarnational ministries in this context, appear to find resistance from believers who want freedom, of not only choosing a dressing code but, also of association. Indeed, the born-again testimony informs not only the moral codes but also the subsequent spirit dynamism in worship.

4.2.2 Cross-centred principle

Athanasius’ (in C.S.M.V., 1977:29) explanation of why Christ had to suffer death on the cross for sinners’ sake, gives a profound missiological focus. Surely, Christ had to become a curse as it had been written, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Athanasius in C.S.M.V., 1977:55) so that by His death, He became a ransom of all. Athanasius (in C.S.M.V. 1977:55), further evokes thought-provoking sentiments about the cross that puts the mission of God in its proper perspective.

“How could He have called us if He had not been crucified, for it is only on the cross that a man dies with arms outstretched? Here, again, we see the fitness of His death and of those outstretched arms: it was that He might draw His ancient people with the one and the Gentiles with the other, and join both together in Himself. Even so, He foretold the manner of His redeeming death, ‘I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself’.”

It seems, Athanasius views the cross of Christ as a focus point for salvation for His ancient people, no doubt the Israelites and the Gentiles, were being called to share in the kingdom of God. Indeed, with regard to missionary call to the Gentiles, Paul, an apostle to the Gentiles was forthright. Paul appears to convey his conviction of the significance of the message of the cross, in his letter to the 1 Cor. 2:2, “For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified.” He further said, “Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:16). However, Hastings (2012:223) argues that while the cross must be preached in every culture, its message ought to be contextualized. For example, Paul in Acts 17, used Athenian narrative to convey the gospel message. Further, Hastings (2012:231) brings to the fore the implications of the wounded Jesus, which implies a servant Christ, who gave his life for the salvation of the world. So, the disciples should not expect less, as they would be expected to suffer, as they proclaim the redemptive mission to the world.

Unfortunately, Christianity has sometimes been used to oppress and displace people. For example, the Rwanda genocide has been said to have been influenced by Christians (the number of Christians in Rwanda is commonly agreed to be over 90% of the total population) through tribal lines (Paul, 2016: 1). This was in spite of the fact that Rwanda had been reckoned to have been the epicentre of East African Revival in the 1920s.

Surely, the image of Christ with nail-scarred hands and feet should be enough message that the cross of Christ was and is to initiate forgiveness, reconciliation, and liberation of God’s people. This should be the language of mission. Indeed, it is widely known that reconciliation and forgiveness have taken root in Rwanda today. Indeed, this can be replicated in countries faced with ethnic tension.

4.2.2.1 Born again testimony; daily sanctification at the cross of Christ

The cross-centred principle could be said to be a central concern that weaves through the Brethren born again testimony. Indeed, the theme song of the Revival sets the pace for the appropriation of the daily sanctification for the Brethren, at the cross of Christ. The following chorus in Luganda/English shows a precise description of the power of the cleansing blood of Jesus:

“Tukutendereza Yesu (We praise You, Jesus)
Yese Mwana Gw’endiga (Jesus the Lamb)
Omusayi Gwo Gunaziza (Your Blood has cleansed me)
Nkwebaza Omulokozi (I thank You, Saviour) (Reed, 2006:vi)”

The third verse emphasizes the impact of the death of Christ on the cross, and his sanctifying blood. Indeed, most of the born again testimonies, include a spectacular aspect of Jesus passion at Calvary. While talking about EARM during the Nairobi 2013 GAFCON meeting, Senyonyi (2013:4) argued that EARM presented Christ crucified, saying that when a man meets the Christ of Calvary, self-effort dies away. This again looks like Keswick ecclesiology of let go and let God, which can lead to passivism. Their emphasis on Jesus’ cleansing blood finds affinity in the cross-centred mission principle. Thus, Senyonyi (2013:4) points out that Brethren, “real mission is just walking with Jesus, victoriously, moment by moment and day by day”.

4.2.2.2 Spirit dynamism and the cross of Christ

Spirit dynamism is less emphasized by Brethren in comparison with the preaching of the Christ crucified. For instance, Senyonyi (2013:4) observes during the 1945 Kabale Convention, it was reported that people were summoned to pray for the Holy Spirit to show them only Jesus. Certainly, Brethren talk about guidance by the Holy Spirit, but themes on the Holy Spirit are rare within their fellowships/conventions (Mambo, 1973:113). Thus, the majority of them prefer rigid liturgy and are not amused by Pentecostal-spirit dynamic ministries.

4.2.2.3 Moral code and the cross of Christ

As mentioned earlier most of the moral codes evolved out of some biblical texts, which appear to have contributed to the development of some unique Brethren lifestyle. Certain dressing code that lacks common decency, from the perspective of Brethren, could raise doubts whether the culprit has ever accepted the crucified Christ, as Lord and Saviour. Certainly, Brethren believe in the authority of the Bible, as the salvific word of God. Indeed, in the language of the Lausanne Covenant of 1974, the Bible is, “…the only written word of God, without error in all that it affirms, and the only infallible rule of faith and practice....” (Yamamori, 1993:178). The Brethren may have challenges the interpretation and appropriation of Scriptural messages, but their firm belief in the authority of the Bible should be emulated. Thus, “Every man a Bible student” (Church, 1981:62) was the fundamental philosophy of the founders of EARM. This has not changed in the present time and should be at the centre of the cross-centred mission.

4.2.3 Centripetal-centrifugal principle

Centripetal-centrifugal mission principle can be viewed as two sides of the same coin, whereby Centripetal invites in, while centrifugal sends out. While centripetal has traditionally been ascribed to the Old Testament understanding of mission, where nations were drawn to Israel, the centrifugal mission in the New Testament, depicts Jesus drawing nations to himself. Thus, Ott, et al. (2010:23) avers:

“The centripetal movement is that of nations being attracted as by a magnet to the glory of the Lord manifested in Israel, the nation’s coming to Zion and the centralized worship of the Lord in the temple... The centrifugal movement of mission in the New Testament marks a reversal, with God’s new people being sent out to the nations, to be a witness among the nations. The nations are not to come to God’s people in Jerusalem, but God’s people are to go to the nations.”

Consequently, the centripetal-centrifugal concept appears to have attracted debates on its suitability as a mission principle. Indeed, as noted by Blauw (1962:35), “There is no thought of mission in the Old Testament in the centrifugal sense in which it comes to the fore in the New Testament.”

Nevertheless, the view that centripetal mission is a concern of Israel in the Old Testament has been challenged from Scripture by Bosch (1980:78) who observes, “Astrologers came from East to Jerusalem to look for the Saviour of the world (Matt.2)…. The Roman army officer coming to Jesus (Matt.8:5) and the Greeks traveling to Jerusalem to see Jesus (John 12:20) give expression to the same idea: Salvation is to be found in Israel, and the nations who wish to partake of it should go there.”

However, it would seem the centripetal concept in the two testaments beckon nations for salvation, albeit differently as observed by Blauw above. Indeed, the centripetal mission in the light of the New Testament passages cited above could be viewed as mission par excellence. This is because the encounters with Jesus led to the proclamation of the Gospel and thus centrifugal mission. “As the Father has sent me, I am sending you.” (John 20:21) The Father sends Jesus to win salvation; so Jesus sends his disciples to announce salvation.

As Bosch (1980:78-79) observes, there could be a tendency to understand mission in the Old Testament as entirely the work of God, and centrifugal mission in the New Testament as man’s work. This is because, man and God appear to be competitors, whereby, man’s activity tends to exclude God’s and vice versa. But, this shouldn’t be the case because Christians expect God’s presence in the believers’ mission activities. Furthermore, argues Bosch (1980:79) by recognizing that the church’s mission is God’s activity, then we may speak of it as our activity as we participate in it.

4.2.3.1 Born again testimony and centripetal-centrifugal mission

Deep in the EARM’s testimony is the concept of a daily walk with God, which informs their walking in the light. Therefore, the idea of going or sending, in the light of centrifugal mission, has been a rallying cry among Brethren missions. A Brethren faction like thama (Exodus), appears to have emulated the call of Abraham and left physically to a far country.
4.2.3.2 Spiritual dynamism and centripetal-centrifugal mission

The neophytes are put in a seclusion segment known as gatia-uki, “a pool of honey,” where the local Brethren meet with them once a week, instilling rules and regulations of born-again Christians. As they mature spiritually, they may be allowed to attend and participate in other segments, such as district, national and East Africa conventions. Thus, a semblance of centripetal-centrifugal characteristics are seen as the neophytes come into gatia-uki for instructions. They are then sent out to participate in the mission field, from the district to the East Africa level.

Likewise, to counter legalization of homosexuality and other vices, the GAFCON 2013 meeting in Nairobi recommended the Anglican Church to go back to the faith of EARM based scriptural authority (Walton, 2013: Online). This looks like a centripetal mission, in which EARM would become a school for the Anglican Church leadership, who would then be sent back (centrifugal) to preach a transformational mission in their churches.

4.2.3.3 Moral code and centripetal-centrifugal mission

One thing that has fundamentally impacted EARM is its propensity to care for its members. Its beliefs and practices informed by strict moral code seem to have enforced their typical inward looking mission. Nevertheless, in the 1970s, their smart dressing attracted admirers as observed by research participants (ordinary members in Kirinyaga). This could have contributed to increased membership because many people reviled the general fashion of the day. This inward-looking attitude, mostly influenced by the dressing code, might have contributed to the centripetal mission and subsequently turnaround centrifugal mission. However, sending out of Brethren missions today, bogged down with these codes, have been faced with resistance, particularly from the young generation. Furthermore, the majority of Brethren are elderly. Thus, the generation gap has been a challenge to the mission. Indeed, a clergy member in Embu, who participated in this research, argued for a propriety dressing code. Thus, the tension between Brethren and young generation hinders mission.

4.2.4 Missio logoi principle

The principle of missio logoi is critical if proper articulation of the gospel is to be realistic. Hiebert and Meneses (1995:370) seem right in saying that, “divine revelation must take flesh in human languages and cultures. Just as Christ chose to live in a particular time and setting, so we must incarnate our ministry in the contexts of the people we serve”. Muck (2016:5-6), adds that missio logoi has to do with mission languages, such as languages of analysis, of media and languages of participation. Furthermore, Muck (2016:6) contends that “the many languages of mission in each of these three categories can be used inwardly as ways for Christians to talk about their missions to one another, and outwardly as means of expressing the gospel to non-Christians”. Certainly, this might not be possible without the development of faith in the lives of communities served by the missionaries.

Additionally, Dunaetz (2016:67) observes that the Bible views faith as a double-edged concept, which is both relational and cognitive. On the one hand, the relational view emphasizes God’s imitativeness (John 3:16) to reconcile humanity to Himself. On the other hand, the cognitive view describes a human rational process as depicted by the author of Hebrews 11:1. Therefore, Dunaetz (2016:67) further notes that the relational and cognitive dimensions of faith are critical in actualizing the biblical concept of πίστις. This cognitive dimension contends Dunaetz (2016:67), is similar to what social psychologists call attitude certainty, the degree to which an individual is certain that a particular opinion or belief is correct. Besides, Dunatetz (2016:67) emphasizes that “findings from psychological science concerning attitude certainty may provide insights to missionaries as they seek to effectively minister to others through their missio-logoi”.
The greater the attitude certainty that people have, the more confidence they will have to act on their beliefs, and the more likely they are to oppose distractors of what they believe to be true.

Unquestionably, the colonizing Europe came to Africa with a cynical mind about Africa. Indeed, Baur (1994:281) observes that in the eyes of colonizing Europe, the Africans were ‘savages’ to be civilized, ‘cursed sons of Ham’ to be saved, ‘big children’ to be educated. This derogatory and demeaning attitude towards Africans followed in hot pursuit of the pioneering missionaries, some of whom collaborated with colonialists, to the detriment of African mission.

Moreover, Walls (1966:199) narrates David Livingstone’s description of a typical 19th-century missionary as dumpy sort of a man with a Bible under his arm, whose formal education was not high enough to have him receive Anglican ordination in the home ministry. Thus, an attitude certainly might have given a low image of the missionaries going for overseas mission. Worse still, some missionaries were unworthy to be in the mission field on account of their bad conduct. Baur (1994:59) observes King Afonso of Kongo complained to King Manuel of Portugal; “in this kingdom, the faith is still as fragile as glass on account of the bad example of those who came to teach it... Today our Lord is crucified anew by the very ministers of his body and blood. We would have preferred not to be born than to see how our innocent children… run into perdition on account of these bad examples”. Indeed, such unscrupulous behaviour spoke volumes and contributed to the cold reception of the gospel, particularly in the 16th century Christianity. So, missionaries must not only depict acceptable behaviour but must also be willing to learn from the community to avoid any aspect of negative attitude certainty. Certainly, behavioural-cultural norms remain critical and determine the success of missions.
Following this argument, when attitude certainty is conceived it will inform people’s beliefs and subsequent practices, either positively or negatively. Thus, when attitude certainty of some Christians drives them to perceive things differently, it will be difficult to persuade them to abandon that belief. Indeed, as Njoku (2007:204) observes,

“Beyond the problem of communication posed by language and cultural barrier, preaching by European missionaries, with the intention to persuade the people rationally to abandon the faith of their ancestors and embrace the Christian faith, was at best a stalemate, but in general failed to convince the adult population... Some Christian doctrines were, in the eyes of the adult representatives of the traditional religion, simply illogical and even nonsensical.”

So, missio logoi should take cognizance of the mission languages to do justice in the communication of the gospel to people of other faiths.

4.2.4.1 Born again testimony and missio logoi

Undoubtedly, the language of the mission is a fundamental principle of mission that Brethren ought to propagate in words of their testimony and action. Indeed, the majority are illiterate but fluent in their mother tongue. Certainly, they are useful in the local mission, facilitating in their vernacular language. However, the majority requires services of an interpreter during national and international conventions.

They seem to delight in scriptural texts that teach about confession, forgiveness, and restitution. For example, they applaud Zacchaeus’ (Luke 19:8) decision to put right what seemed to have contradicted Christian living. Many Brethren follow Zacchaeus’ repentance model when they get born again, and this positively impacts the mission field. The letter to 2 Cor. 3:1-3 has been taken as a mission text by Brethren, as they undertake the mission, as letters of Christ to the nation.

4.2.4.2 Spiritual Dynamics and missio logoi

Certainly, the language of the mission could be regarded as one of the most profound ways of expressing various forms of worship. In this way, Christians with different gifts find their bearing in contextual mission areas. In this regard, one of the prominent stakeholders of EARM argued that Bishops should be transferrable to share their gifts with the whole Anglican Church of Kenya. Indeed, most of the Anglican Bishops in Kenya have been influenced by the EARM, and are frequently given a speakers slot during convention meetings. Others, like the late Archbishop David Gitari of the Anglican Church of Kenya and a renowned Rural Dean in the Diocese of Kirinyaga, Robert Kariuki, claim devotional Bible reading by Brethren, without proper exegesis hinders mission (Gitari, n.d:5; Kariuki, 2001:12). Furthermore, a holistic discipleship of the neophyte, free to exercise gifts of the Holy Spirit has been tailored to suit a stereotyping lifestyle.

4.2.4.3 Moral code and missio logoi

Indeed, the concept of missio-logoi from various biblical texts might have influenced the Brethren’s Christian life, leading to their devotional reading of the Bible. The resultant socio-ethical beliefs and practices have created tensions between Brethren and other Christians, and sometimes within themselves. Certainly, the subsequent Brethren’s language and behaviour have at times led to dissensions and damaging self-righteous attitudes towards other believers.

The ensuing missio logoi moral code sometimes influences the direction that a dialogue would take between a Brethren and a non-Brethren. This certainly, falls within the confines of do’s and don’ts, whereby Brethren would claim to have social decorum, while non-Brethren, indecorum. So, one of the major challenges of this ethical reading is that it denies justice to the meaning of the text.

4.2.5 Missio Dei principle

Most of the believers’ prayers for mission work appear to lift humanity, and God is only invited to go with them. Indeed, one of the common prayers for the mission is, “Lord, we call upon you to go with us on this mission.” Thus, humanity seems to have dethroned missio Dei for missio homo, forgetting that, it is not us inviting God to mission work, but that it is God who is inviting humanity to his mission to the world (Galgalo, 2012:37). Believers are only invited to participate, and not sent to carry out God’s mission.

Wright (2006:22-23) argues that if mission should be biblically cognizant and authenticated, then its meaning should include the believers’ “committed participation as God’s people, at God's invitation and command in God's mission within the history of God's world for the redemption of God’s creation”. Wright (2006:23) further contends that God is the owner of mission while the Church is a participant upon invitation and command of God. Moreover, the fact that Wright (2006:23) mentions the purpose of God's mission as the redemption of God's creation fits well with Bosch's (2009:390) version that the church is an instrument of God’s love in the world. So, it has nothing of its own. Thus, the mission mandate ought to be founded on being in a bonding relationship with God because “as invited participants believers are tasked to provide the medium through which God’s redemptive activity can touch the world…believers are called to be God-bearers (Theotokos) in clarifying, fulfilling and furthering God’s mission in the world” (Galgalo, 2012:37-38).
4.2.5.1 Born again testimony and missio Dei

It is a challenge to participate in the mission of God while Brethren’s spiritual self-awareness is predisposed to be better than other Christians. This seems true in Brethren’s practice of walking in the light, in which giving testimony, signifies one is a born again (saved) Christian, therefore, a better Christian. Those who do not share their testimony are labeled not saved, and thus excluded from Brethren fellowship. Brethren appear keen on serving God, and seemingly, willing participants in the missio Dei. However, the challenge is that they display ego over and above other believers’ ways of expressing their faith. This betrays Brethren’s perceived love of God, demonstrated in action and words of testimony. Indeed, they seem to front salvation by work, and that could set a wrong precedent for those entering the kingdom.

4.2.5.2 Spirit dynamics and missio Dei

Since the Holy Spirit has the unique attribute of regenerating unbelievers (John 3:5-8) and bringing them to faith in Christ, he is at the centre of the mission. In this way, churches are brought into spiritual maturity, as to initiate missional impacts in community transformation. However, if believers do not subject themselves to the indwelling power of the Holy Spirit, the result is not only a lifeless teaching and preaching but also, a shoddy mission and failure in the church growth. No wonder Ott (2010:242) contends that the Holy Spirit's ministry should be unlimited, because, “the Spirit’s power is necessary for every aspect of missionary work”.

Therefore, when Brethren tend to obstruct spiritual dynamics in their fellowships and missions, they appear to limit the ministry of the Holy Spirit. But, missio Dei entails priority of God in his mission, because He is a mission God. Again, since the mission is Trinitarian, God the Father and the Son sending the Holy Spirit, it means spiritual manifestations of the Holy Spirit are activities of God. Thus, an attempt to suppress the ministry of the Holy Spirit is tantamount to non-participation in the missio Dei. The result, is the elevation of missio homo, rendering Brethren's mission's human-driven and powerless, regardless of their tireless effort in the organization of missions, ranging from the weekly Gatia-uki to the yearly East African convention.

4.2.5.3 Moral code and missio Dei

Certainly, by constructing legalistic codes of conduct, based on beliefs and practices of walking in the light, Brethren appear to have turned missio Dei into missio homo, affecting the freedom of worship. Surely, Brethren’s task should be that of clarifying salvation, but not of blocking those who are entering into God’s kingdom.
Indeed, moral codes are not wrong in themselves, and when applied correctly can become useful instruments to harness the demands of the kingdom. Undoubtedly, the Israelites were subjected to the Decalogue, to guide them in their walk with God. Indeed, the objective of the moral law was to give guidelines on Israel's participation in the missio Dei. That means, moral codes ought to direct believers to participate in the mission of God, and not to subject them to missio homo activities.

4.3 INTERPRETATION OF THE MAIN BIBLICAL TEXTS TO GIVE MISSIOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES ON THE PREVAILING SITUATION

In order to carry out an exegetical and theological study of the selected scriptural texts that form the bedrock of Keswick influence on EARM beliefs and practice, a grammatical-historical method (Marshall, 2003:100-123) will be used. This is because the study seeks to ascertain the historical relevance of these texts to the EARM. So, the historical development of the interpretation of the texts will be necessary to debunk/appraise beliefs and practices that have led to the prevailing situation. However, since this study has a missiological perspective, the researcher will not delve into an in-depth study of the selected texts.

In chapter three the researcher named the eight most dominant biblical texts that could have contributed to the practice of walking in the light. These are: Ephesians 5:14; Daniel 1:8-16; 1 Cor. 11:13-15; 2 Cor. 6:14-18; Ephesians 6:13; Genesis 12:1; Romans 13:8 and Psalms 127:1ff. This sequence is in the order of dominance and significance of the text to Brethren's beliefs and practices of walking in the light. But, since this exegetical study is only a section of this chapter, attempting to interpret all these texts will not be possible. So, four texts will suffice based on their dominance and possible influence on the prevailing practice of walking in the light by members of EARM in the selected ACK Dioceses of Mount Kenya region. These are: Ephesians 5:14; 6:13; 1 Cor. 11:13-15 and Daniel 1:8-16. Since, the main theme of Daniel 1:8-16 and 2 Cor. 6:14-18 is separation, the Daniel text has been preferred, not only by virtue of representing the Old Testament context but also for its popularity among the research participants.

Again, since this is a historical study, at least three epochs of interpretation have been outlined. These are; early Christianity, Reformation, and modern. Due to the apparent growth in the interest of interpretation in the modern era, the texts have been broken into parts. This would make it possible for the researcher to analyze the scholars' perception of words and phrases effectively. Further, to put the texts into their proper historical perspective, an attempt at the examination of the wider and the immediate contexts is pivotal.
4.3.1 Historical development of the interpretation of the Ephesians

4.3.1.1 Historical setting of the Ephesians

Although the researcher acknowledges various viewpoints about the authorship of this letter, this thesis specifically engages interpretation of the text from the historical point of view. This is to ascertain the influence of such texts in the prevailing beliefs and practices of walking in light in EARM.

The date of this letter Hoehner (2002:96) argues is severely affected by various theories associated with the venue of Paul’s imprisonment. The traditional view of Roman imprisonment is profoundly supported by the Bible (Acts 25:6-28:31), a view championed by most scholars. Hoehner (2002:96) appears to suggest that Ephesians was written towards the end of his Roman incarceration in early 62 CE. Certainly, Hoehner (2002:96) and Arnold (2010:43) observe that Paul could have sent Tychicus with both the Ephesians and the Colossians (6:21; Col. 4:7) letters. Indeed, Arnold (2010:43) implies that Paul saw it an excellent opportunity to send Tychicus with a more general letter to address Ephesian Christians and other nearby churches. But Perkins (2000:351) contends that most scholars think the letter is pseudonymous. This is because it appears to lack Paul’s presence. However, the researcher is convinced that this letter is most likely written by Paul because the circulation of a letter via proxy is quite normal.

Having placed the dating into its perspective, it is critical to understand the background of Ephesian believers. The city of Ephesus has been branded the mother city of Asia in respect to her influence as “the headquarters of the Roman Proconsul and the seat of the Confederacy (the Koinon) of the Greeks in Asia” (Arnold, 2010:30). By virtue of Ephesus’ position as a cosmopolitan and multiethnic city, it became a home for various religions. The goddess Artemis (Diana) observes Arnold (2010:31, 33), had a strong bonding relationship with the city. This made her referred to as Artemis of the Ephesians, besides other deities, up to fifty gods and goddesses. Thus, Perkins (2000:361) observes that the Artemis cult shows the preeminence of the goddess above all other powers.

In addition to religious deities, there were magic and folk belief phenomena. One of the best examples was the failed exorcism attempt by Sceva’s sons (Acts 19:13-20) when they were overpowered by the demonized man for allegedly failing to account for Jesus and Paul’s name. This led to what Arnold (2010:33) termed as dreadful fear and conviction among the believing community. It also suggests many of those who were becoming Christians had not only been involved in magical activities but also pointed out their attachment to the spiritual realms. Moreover, Perkins (2000:361) claims that Paul’s “emphasis on Christ’s exaltation above the powers of the cosmos and the identification of believers with their exalted head forms the centre of the book Ephesians."

In the midst of the preceding, there were Jewish synagogues, which indicate Jewish presence in the city since 3rd century BCE. Thus, Arnold (36-37) asserts that many Jews had become Roman citizens and were granted permission, religio lecita, to practice their religious traditions, like food laws. No wonder, Aune (2000:921) observes that the traditional Roman forms of public and private worship were mostly practised by those who were ethnically Roman. This means non-Roman plus those who acquired Roman citizenship were allowed to practice their religion.

Concerning the Imperial cult, Arnold (2010:40) suggests it was based more on political than religious inclinations and served to influence the status of imperial power. Also, Aune (2000:923) attests to the fact that towards the end of the 3rd century BCE, many cults were instituted by the Greek cities. Thus, Julius Caesar and Augustus were deified by an official act of the Roman Senate to assume the status of the official pantheon of the Romans. This may serve to support Paul's insinuation that "our struggle is not against blood and flesh but the authorities..." (6:12). This warlike claim by Paul depicts a picture of contention between believers and evil powers. Thus, a call to awake in 5:14 and to stand in 6:13 to contend with powerful forces that might have taken captive the Ephesian believers.

4.3.1.2 Immediate context of Ephesians 5:14

"Therefore it says, Awake, O sleeper, and arise from the dead, and Christ will shine on you" (πᾶν γὰρ τὸ φανερούμενον φῶς ἐστιν. διὸ λέγει· Ἔγειρε, ὁ καθεύδων, καὶ ἀνάστα ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, καὶ ἐπιφαύσει). The phrase, therefore it says (διό λέγει), seems to give authority to the text regarding its origin and authority. But, its source, argues scholars, like Eadie (1861:398) and Thielman (2010:348) is shrouded in uncertainty. However, the majority including Aquinas (in Lamb [translator], 1966:208) refer to Isaiah 60:1, though Arnold (2002:331) disagrees and suggests it was part of the oral tradition within the early church worship. Indeed, interpreters like Perkins (2000:438) place it in the baptismal rites in the early church. This is supported by Klein (2006:140), who adds that whatever the source of the hymn it has a moral appeal.

Nevertheless, Perkins (2000:438) observes that it depicts images of Jerusalem, as the Lord calls the city awake, rise and shine, a description consistent with the coming Messiah. Thus, Thielman (2010:349) claims that waking from sleep, resurrection from the dead, and enlightenment was part of the Middle East antiquity which has metaphorical significance - in Jewish contexts it shows a change in a person who has joined God's covenant community.
So, Paul could have used this setting to contrast darkness vs. light, death vs. life images to describe conversion (Gal. 2:19-20; 2 Cor. 4:4-6; Rom. 6:3-11). Therefore, Paul introduces this text as if it carries the authority of scripture", Διό λέγει (therefore it says) (Thielman, 2010: 349) meaning, like scripture this text speaks to the present.

4.3.1.3 Ancient interpretation

Some of the early church interpreters like Ambrosiaster\textsuperscript{80} (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:197), seems to have understood sleep as lethargy of mind, associated with sort of death or darkness from which Ephesians were called to rise to light and life in Christ. But, Chrysostom (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:197) appears to suggest Paul was addressing both unbelievers and believers who were deep in sin and he was therefore prudent to call them awake. While Ambrosiaster seems to interpret the text metaphorically, Chrysostom seems more forthright that sin is sleep.

4.3.1.4 Medieval interpretation

Aquinas (in Lamb, 1966:208), one of the most influential medieval thinkers of Scholasticism, claims that this text is inconsistent with Pauline. He appears to perceive it as an image borrowed from Isaiah 60:1. He seems to understand that the ones asleep are called to arise from dead/evil works to receive Christ's enlightenment and perform good work of light. He contends that justification of a sinner comes after free decision to co-operate in the act of rising from sin.

4.3.1.5 Reformation interpretation

Calvin (n.d:312-313) observes that the light\textsuperscript{81} of Christ enlightens and delivers unbelievers from death to life. Thus, Calvin encourages believers to work hard to awaken the sleeping and the dead and bring them to the light of Christ. Therefore, Sarcerius (2011:372) a Lutheran reformer, maintains that when every work of darkness is exposed, confessed and repented it becomes light and does works of light. Also, Bucer\textsuperscript{82} (2011:372-3) contends that evil should be called by its name because light makes plain what was hitherto hidden. Otherwise one would not be worthy to be called a child of light. Further, Diodati (2011:373) alludes to conversion as an antidote to awake from the sleep or death of sin, which would lead to enlightenment by the light of the gospel. Hence, one walks according to the gospel statutes.

\textsuperscript{80} “Despite the elusive identity of Ambrosiaster, several facts about him can be established. Internal evidence suggests he was active in Rome during the reign of Pope Damasus (366–384), and almost certainly a member of the Roman clergy” (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ambrosiaster).

Similarly, Dickson (2011:373) brings to the fore the preaching of the gospel as a way of raising those who are asleep and dead to repentance, by faith in Christ. In other words, he understood the awake from the dead to life, implies re-awakening to faith in Christ. So, to deal with sinners, he is of the opinion that this understanding of the text, should be commended to others.

4.3.1.6 Modern interpretation

4.3.1.6.1 Awake O sleeper, Ἔγειρε, ὁ καθεύδων,

The phrase, awake O sleeper, Ἔγειρε, ὁ καθεύδων, appears to indicate in Paul’s mind the condition of those addressed, that they were sound asleep, καθεύδω (fall asleep). Eadie (1861:399), argues that the Apostle was calling them awake from this slumber, described as stupor of death. On the one hand, Eadie (1861:399) appears to view sleep as eulogism of death, while falling asleep, as a metaphorical description of dying. On the other hand, he depicts rise from the dead as imperative, stand up, in the face of satanic assaults (6:11, 13-14). By doing this, argues Barth (1960:576), the Messiah will shine upon you.

The wake up appears like imperative ἔγειρε used to rouse people from their sleep (Matt. 8:25). But, the verb καθεύδων though is used for natural sleep, Paul seems to use it here for spiritual lethargy (1 Thess. 5:6), where some believers had become collaborators with works of darkness and needed awakening towards deeds that please God. Believers are therefore encouraged to wake up from spiritual laziness, because as sleepers they may not realize their spiritual ignorance.

Certainly Eadie (1861:399) appears to view it as a prophecy addressed to Zion, which had been sleeping and dead. Indeed, Findlay (1892:335) connects the quotation with the Old Testament, especially Isaiah 60:1-3. Lincoln (1990: 331) concurs and moreover seems to associate heritage of the text to early Judaism, which illustrates imagery of death of sin and sleep - image for physical death. Furthermore, sleep is viewed as the condition of forgetfulness and drunkenness, part of belonging to the sinful darkness (1 Thess. 5:5-8; Rom. 13:11-14). Whereas, baptism is arising from the death of sin (Rom. 6:13; 6:4). In the same way, the church in the armour of light and joy of salvation, ought to confront the darkness for the time has come for the dead to hear the voice of Christ and live.

Indeed Stott (1979:199) on the one hand likens darkness with ignorance and evil, while on the other hand compares light with righteousness and truth. So, the change from darkness to light gives the impression of union with the Lord, the light of the world. This means that for a Christian, when anything is exposed by the light, it becomes visible (Stott, 1979:200). Thus, Stott (1979: 201) sees “conversion as awaking out of sleep, rising from death and being brought out of darkness into the light of Christ”. So, argues Lincoln (1990: 332), “these words [5:14] heard at their baptism function now to remind the readers of the power of the light, of the transformation of their new status that has taken place and of its ethical implications”. Their baptism, then, signified a movement from the sleep of spiritual death into the light of life in response to the divine call. Thus, Lincoln (1990: 335) maintains that both divine initiative and human effort are represented in conversion.

4.3.1.6.2 Arise from the dead (ἀνάστα ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν)

About, the phrase, rise from the dead (ἀνάστα ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν), Hoehner (2002:687-88), observes the imperative ἀνάστα denotes urgency to rise from death. It is used to signify rising from the dead (physically), but in the present context, it seems to refer to a spiritual deadening illustrated by the unfruitful works of darkness. So, Paul urges unbelievers to awake and with urgency arise from the path that leads to death. In addition, the command to arise (ἀνίστημι), argues Eadie (1861:400), is similar to that given by the Lord to the man with the withered hand, “Stretch out your hand” (Mark 3:5). Moreover, Arnold (2010: 335) likens the phrase to a person dead in transgressions and sins. So, Paul calls the believers to consider themselves as dead to the power of sin, but alive to God in Christ Jesus (Rom 6:11).

Therefore, believers should not only shun darkness but exemplify new identity in Christ who will then shine on them. Beet (1902:354) asserts that Paul used Ephesians 5:14 to bring hidden things to light because a sleeper is a sinner who needs to arise from the dead, or from the sleep of sin. He reckons Christians are the medium through which the light shines. Therefore, Westcott (1906:79) states that the light has transforming power, ἐγείρε... ἀνάστα, awake from sleep, arise to action. Gore (1923: 195) suggests this power should separate believers from the morally dead/works of darkness and reprove the dark world of sin. Therefore, the charge is to arise and be light for your light has come (Eadie, 1861:399).

No wonder Thielman (2010:350-351) claims that the phrase appears to envision a preacher of the gospel calling the unbeliever, who is imagined as asleep and dead, to a resurrected life in which the light of Christ will shine (ἐπιφαύσι o Χριστός) on him or her. Thus, Get up, O sleeper, and rise from the dead, appears to recall the language of 2:1, 5-6. Here Paul describes his readers as formerly dead in their trespasses and sins and now not only are they made alive and raised, but are seated together with Christ. Thus, ἐγείρε, has been interpreted like waking someone from sleep (Mark 4:27) and has the same idea of rousing a believer to vigilance and sobriety (1 Thess. 5:6).

4.3.1.6.3 Christ will shine on you (ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ Χριστός)

The verb to enlighten, ἐπιφαύω is likened to a flash of light of Christ upon the dead, to bring them (ἀνάστα) into life. Hoehner (2002:688) contends that ἐπιφαύω is directed to the believer who is a partaker of the deeds of darkness. The believer is commanded to awake from his spiritual sleep and rise from spiritual deadness so that Christ will shine on him. Thus, Moule (1902: 261) seems to call upon the light of God to shine on awful human darkness. In this way, the enlightened (believers) would carry God’s transforming radiance to those in darkness. But this says Barth, (1960: 576) happens not on the ground of man’s power but because of radiant Messiah himself. In other words, the shining Messiah communicates something of his essence to those illuminated, so that in his light they become light. The enlightenment described here is equivalent to the justification of the sinner…. (Barth, 1960: 577).

With regard to the phrase, Christ shall shine on you, (ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ Χριστός), Thielman (2010:351), argues that unbelievers should awake to embrace the gospel and rise from their previous ways of darkness. By so doing, contend Thielman (2010:351) and Snodgrass (1996:
274) Christ will not only enlighten (expose) unbelievers but also transform them into the life-giving light. This means that believers shouldn’t shy from rebuking sin, though sometimes does more harm than good. Nevertheless, with discernment, believers cannot afford not call darkness dark.

Certainly, Dale (1900: 334) sees the Ephesian Christians as carriers of this light into the darkness of heathenism. Indeed, vs. 8, 9 shows that Christians were charged with walking as children of light, having acceptable moral habits and alertness of mind. Since, this light was not to be concealed but to illuminate the dark places, Eadie, (1861:399) and Gore (1923:198) oberves that “true enlightenment is not the privilege of a few, but is open to all who will come to Christ.” Indeed, Paul’s model of Christianity “has everything to gain and nothing to lose by disclosure of life in the light” (Gore, 1923: 201).

Undeniably, Thielman (2010: 351) depicts this phrase as a recall of 5:8, which describes Paul’s readers’ movement from their former existence, defined by darkness, to a life defined by light.
Thus, the church should live by values that oppose darkness. But this, argues Lincoln (1990: 335), is not meant to isolate the church from the world because believers should shine, illuminating how life should be lived. This would give the church a distinct identity of transforming the darkness around it and play its crucial missionary role as the domain of light.
As a result, Arnold (2010:334) claims that this phrase urgently admonishes believers living in sinful lifestyle (sleepers) and calls them to have exemplary conduct. That is, they should be alert and sober.
4.3.1.7 Appraisal of interpretation of Ephesians 5:14 by Brethren

4.3.1.7.1 Awake O sleeper

As implied earlier, Ambrosiaster (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:179) and Stott (1979:199) understand this phrase as a metaphor and symbolism respectively. While not literally applicable, the figures of speech signify the interpreters did not understand the expression ἐγερέ, ὑ καθεύδων in the literal sense. Thus, Ambrosiaster’s term ‘sleep’, as a stupor of mind, estranged from the truth, while Stott contrasts darkness and light. Whereas Brethren would be happy to compare works of darkness and works of light, they will not likely associate sleep with the status of mind, but a spiritual condition inclined to worldliness. So, the dictums of the do’s and the don’ts characterize their fellowship. The do’s represent things they consider of light, such as righteousness and truth, while don’ts represent worldly things of darkness, ignorance and evil. Anyone who does not conform to this concept of being awake is excluded from their fellowship.

Since Stott (1979:201) views conversion as awaking out of sleep or rising from death, a sentiment shared by Diodati (2011:373), then there is a disconnect with Brethren who seems to see conversion as a prelude to becoming a Brethren/born again. It seems like these two scholars were referring to justification, God’s gift of salvation, which is believed to be a one-time occurrence. It, however, looks like Brethren do not think justification alone qualifies a believer to join Fellowship. Some outward signs like saying a testimony/public confession of sin and consequent moral transformation would serve as sufficient parameters to qualify to join the Brethren.

Indeed, as Chrysostom (1999:179) observes, the main contention of Brethren is to have dominion over sin. This is what Keswick teaching called besetting sin (Brooke, 1907:80); that is amending wrongs done, or practical deliverance, a word that to some extent, was adopted by EARM (Gitari, 2014:294) to depict recurring sins. That could be the reason for daily cleansing or walk in light among Brethren. However, awake as interpreted by Chrysostom (1999:179) could mean arising from sin or leaving sin, a fact Brethren would endorse. A respondent from Mount Kenya Central said they had been raised from sins.

Again, the fact that Eadie (1861: 400) unravels the church as the one that ‘sleepeth’ and should awake would be welcomed by Brethren. This is because it has always been the Brethren’s

83 As mentioned earlier, the term Brethren (saved ones) refers to EARM in Kenya as opposed to Balokole in Uganda. Indeed, research participants, particularly in the Diocese of Mount Kenya West were categorical that they are not a movement, but a revival fellowship. Thus, the term Brethren (Fellowship) seems preferable in this study.

84 Keswick movements abhorred worldly amusement like alcoholism, smoking and immorality. Indeed, Pearsall Smith, one of the founders of Keswick Movement lost his ministry for being suspected of sexual impropriety.
contention that the church (non-Brethren members) has been profoundly asleep and should awake. Thus, Brethren unlike Calvin (n.d:312-313) don’t seem to associate the term sleep with unbelievers but with believers who are worldly. A similar observation is made by Hoehner (2002:687) that Paul was admonishing believers indulging in the unprofitable work of darkness. So, it seems Hoehner’s views complement Brethren’s concept of awake, though if the text was a baptismal formula, it could likewise interrogate unbelievers’ conversion. But since the authenticity of this text is vague the Brethren’s view of addressee appears valid.

Thus, Brethren would be happy with Stott’s (above) contrast of light and darkness, and somewhat Ambrosiaster’s concept of sleep as a lethargy of mind might not be accepted. Nevertheless, Ambrosiaster’s description could be accurate because of rational human character that might prove inept in matters of God. It seems the church has had almost a uniform understanding of, Awake, O sleeper, since the time of the early church.

4.3.1.7.2 Arise from the dead

Ambrosiaster (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:179) seems to associate the dead with non-Christians who need to leave pagan life and become born again. However, Brethren goes beyond this, requiring born-again Christians to exclude from their fellowship anyone who does not live according to their rules of conduct. This creates a two kind of Christian’s syndrome, on one end of the continuum is the born Christian who does not comply with the Brethren moral code, while on the other end is born again Christian who subscribes to Brethren beliefs and practices. This divide has unfortunately led to apathy and suspicion in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. No doubt a dent in the church’s participation in the mission of God.

The command arise (αναστα) appears to have put a wedge within the Revival movement with the claim that some members are dead (νεκρους). This command, though viewed as a figure of speech seems to have been conclusive within the Brethren that some of their members are dead. Therefore, some respondents in Kirinyaga claim this text led to Kufufuka (Arise) faction in EARM in 1967, which came to be called in Gikuyu Arahuka, sometimes referred to as Uriukio (Resurrection). At the point of this split, the general welfare of the church was not necessarily Arahuka’s concern, though they were still members. Indeed, some of the church members had already been labeled unsaved (dead). So, the split was an EARM’s matter and has persisted to date.

In an attempt to interpret the phrase, from the dead, Beet (1902: 354) understands it as a potent metaphor of darkness translated to mean sleep of sin. Ephesians ought to arise and censure sin around them to bring hidden things to light. The phrase sin around them appears exclusive and could have been applied by Brethren to signify that other Christians are dead and need to arise and walk with them as children of light. Subsequently, Brethren appear to regard themselves as righteous. Others around them need to arise and join them. This strong appeal seems to fit Brethren’s resolve to preach salvation as they understand it aggressively.

Thus, Arnold (2010:334) observes that rise from the dead appears to mean a rise from those who are dead in transgressions and sins. This could have easily been associated with Paul’s (5:7) summon on believers to differentiate themselves from unbelievers in their conduct. But this does not mean Christians are called to isolate themselves from the world but are called to live differently from their non-Christian acquaintances. Indeed, Aquinas (1966:208) understood to arise from sleep or death to denote leaving behind bad works of sin. He did not seem to mean geographical separation from unbelievers as applied by Brethren. Surely, Christians should nurture fellow believers wallowing in sin to maturity without loading them with unnecessary burdens of do’s and don’ts.

4.3.1.7.3 And Christ will shine on you

The verb επιφαυσκω, to shine, notes Hoehner (2002: 688), is directed to the believer who is a partaker of the deeds of darkness. The believer is commanded to awake from his spiritual sleep and rise from spiritual deadness so that Christ will shine on him. Brethren would love this as it justifies their clamour for the believers to walk in the light. This light is not to be hidden; it is to illuminate the dark places (Dale, 1900:399). Maybe, Barth’s (1960:577) understanding of enlightenment and justification could further help understand Brethren’s position with regard to this verb. He appears to apportion divine initiative to Christ and human effort to believer’s lifestyle (v.15). This could be explained by the works of God at justification and sanctification, where the latter could involve experiential sanctification, with strict moral obligations on the part of the believers. This is where Brethren’s spirituality revolves as they work out daily sanctification of their lives.

Thus, Aquinas’ (in Lamb, 1966:208) interpretation that justification of sinners is a requisite to rising from sin might differ from Brethren’s view. Brethren do not seem to regard justification as a departure from sin, but a beginning of spiritual journey to conversion. Indeed, Diodati (2011:373) alludes to conversion as a prerequisite to being enlightened by the light of the gospel and walking according to its statutes. Ordinarily, justification is meritorious, but to Brethren good works must prevail. This is what Keswick theology appears to call victorious life or higher Christian life (Naselli, 2010:45). Thus, Barabas (1952:30-31) notes that Keswick was like a spiritual clinic for spiritual casualties in the church who needed spiritual remedies/cures. No doubt this resembles Brethren’s exclusive fellowship, whereby those outside the Fellowship are termed spiritually sick and needing a cure. The remedy (victorious living), according to Brethren is found in the daily walk with Christ.
Also, Calvin (n.d:312) seems to understand Paul to mean that when Christ enlightens unbelievers, they rise from death to life. So, Calvin appears to see Christ’s light as a life-giving to the dead (sleepers) at justification. But, Brethren appear to view it as Christ’s sanctification, which is experiential to those who are already justified, but living in sin and should arise.

So, Gore’s (1923: 200) practical aspects of darkness and light could be crucial in apprehending the phrase, and Christ will shine upon you. This because the phrase seems to reflect on the Brethren aspect of seeing they are the best, forgetting this light is open to all, even those who may interpret differently. Actually, application of this phrase could bend towards moral intelligence or scientific views. But these could still be dark alleys and far away from the light of Christ. There is nothing to lose by disclosing the light, though some Brethren’s public testimony might need censorship by the church. Thus, Lincoln (1990:335) contends that the church should have a distinct identity in the midst of the society to transform darkness into light, by showing right attitude in worship and fellowship. Indeed, Brethren lifestyle should shine a light on darkness through interaction and not separate coexistence. Surely, architects of spiritual indifference cannot claim to have been exposed to light when they are not in the light.

Bucer (2011:372), a Swiss reformer, comes very close to Brethren beliefs and practices of calling evil by its name. This is because light makes plain what is hidden and children of light ought to do likewise. This borders on public confession of sin which has long been discouraged because of what may be referred to washing dirty linen in public. But, Sarcerius (2011:372) argues that when every work of darkness is exposed and confessed it becomes a light to those who repent because repentance brings light and does works of light. Thus, Dickson (2011:373) claims the phrase implies that the children of light must preach the gospel. This could only succeed when Brethren interact with other believers and even with unbelievers. Indeed, earlier years of Keswick movement saw Keswick missionaries directed to preach to only Christians and not to pagans (Stock, 1907:137). Thus it looks like Dickson had a hand in influencing Keswick theology which in turn seems to have influenced EARM beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

In addition, Moule (1902:261) one of the proponents of the Keswick Movement argued that Christ shines from the believers to carry his transforming radiance to those in darkness. Westcott (1906:79) adds that the transformative power of the light of Christ leads to rising to action. No wonder Brethren are very aggressive preaching what they understand to be light. But their seeming overemphasis on experiential sanctification may have led them to plummet down the other side of the precipice.
4.3.1.8 Missiological perspectives on Brethren’s interpretation of the Ephesians 5:14

The research participants found this text to be one of the most popular with respect to causing dissension in the EARM. The thrust of the passage, awake, rise and shine, were used by some members of the EARM (Brethren) to insinuate some believers were asleep. Thus, the sleepers/dead were subsequently excluded from the Fellowship because, on the one hand, from Brethren's viewpoint, the sleepers were still lurching in the darkness of sin. On the other hand, the awake, the risen/resurrected ones (ἀναστα) were depicted as the righteous group, thus, named Arise/Awakened faction. They claim that they were not only born again but also resurrected, thus referred to as the Uriukio in Gikuyu language.

The Uriukio faction acclaimed itself self-righteous and is still distinct, but not as profound as in the beginning. This sanctimonious exclusiveness appears to have blurred missiological dynamics in the church. This is, in spite of the fact that Uriukio like any other members of Brethren, claim salvation through Christ. But, the fact that Uriukio at this point appeared to have played down justification as the basis of salvation, and instead elevated experiential sanctification/practical holiness, rendered noncompliance ineligible for Brethren membership.

However, (Wright, 2006:380) observes that exclusivity was used in the Bible to depict a godly model of God’s people to the nations. Certainly, even though God used exclusion/setting apart of certain people, places and items, it was never done to lock out the covenant people, albeit, some were stiff-necked towards evil. It was to identify the people of God amongst the nations.

Thus, Bosch (1991:28) avers the following concerning the all-inclusive mission of Jesus, “...both poor and the rich, both the oppressed and the oppressor, both the sinners and the devout...dissolving alienation and breaking down walls of hostility, of closing boundaries between individuals and groups”. Indeed, Jesus’ mission model would appear impossible for Uriukio, who seemed to exclude not only other Christians but other Brethren as well. In contrast, Jesus’ model brings to Jesus’ fold all and sundry. This model of Jesus would likely be termed anathema, not only by Uriukio but by the entire Brethren family.

But, Wright (2006:387) argues that unity among the Christian believers (1 Peter. 2:9) is pivotal because they are all in Christ and God. So, it follows that mission set up in the context of exclusiveness, is not in the spirit of God, nor does it serve the interest of the entire community of believers. In addition, Bosch (1991:28) claims that inclusiveness of Jesus’ mission is exemplified mostly in the logia (sayings), which can best be described by the preaching of love, even to the adversary. Indeed, Hastings (2012:127) states that believers should be shalom, experiencing and expressing a community influenced by the risen Christ. Surely, a community... that cultivates informed peace is radiant and born-again missional believers, reconciled to Christ and with one another.

So, with regard to mission as an invitation to this community, Henriksen (2010:72) avers, “to be a church called to serve the world and to proclaim the gospel is thus to be a church called to be in and for the world of God - a world often gone astray, but God’s world”. This means that a Christian community like the Uriukio should embrace what it might term worldly, for example, keeping dogs or going for bank loans. The most obvious problem with members of Uriukio is the uninformed elevation of practical holiness. Uriukio, certainly, needs to come down, not necessarily to be worldly but to raise the perceived earthly to the level of the ideal Christian community. Such community would not only attract members of the entire Brethren but non-Brethren, as well. Therefore, as Hastings (2012:129) observes, “the church’s mission is fulfilled in participation with Christ and that its function as such is to point to Christ and what he has already done by way of reconciliation and revelation.”

4.3.2 Historical development of the interpretation of Ephesians 6:13

“Therefore, take the whole armour of God that you may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand” (διὰ τοῦτο ἀναλάβετε τὴν πανοπλίαν τοῦ θεοῦ, ἵνα δυνηθῆτε ἀντιστῆναι ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς πονηρᾶ καὶ ἅπαντα κατεργασάμενοι στῆναι).

4.3.2.1 Immediate context of Ephesians 6:13

While Ephesians 5:14 appeared to have been used by some members of Brethren (Arise faction) to justify their righteousness over and above others, the Ephesians 6:13 seemed to have been used to describe spiritual warfare within Brethren camp on the one hand, and with the mainstream Anglican Church on the other. This scenario appears to have called on Brethren to stand firm in their faith, thus Stand faction. The contention with the Anglican Church in Kenya could be likened to what Wild-Wood (2012:201) described of Balokole, who used to throw salvation challenge to all and sundry, except to themselves.

Thus, to do justice to the interpretation of this text, it is critical to place it in its immediate context. In verse 12 Paul impresses the inherent danger and suggests that the Ephesians struggle is not against flesh and blood but evil forces. Indeed, as Calvin (in Bray [ed.], 2011:400) intimates, the enemies are so powerful that no human power could withstand them. Thus, verse 13 appears to summarize the armour of God explicated throughout Ephesians 6:10-17. No wonder, the majority of Brethren made this verse their motto. Probably because it appears to describe their weapons of warfare against some of their accusers from the mainstream Anglican Church, and to some extent from the Arise faction, among others. So the central verse for this discussion will be Ephesians 6:13. Indeed, Hoehner, (2002:831) notes this verse begins with δια τοῦτο (because of this), suggesting a causal conclusion from the previous verses, presupposing formidable superhuman evil powers pitted against the believers. Thus, a call to put on the whole armour of God to resist the adversary. Arnold, (2010:449) notes the phrase, (δια τοῦτο) points to verses 11-12 and hosts of spiritual evil forces led by the devil that threatens the church. Thus, appeal (verse 11) to believers to dress for war; to put on the armour and to stand/resist attack from enemies. It is like Paul envisions demonic assault happening on the evil day.

Paul is seen repeating the command, therefore, take the whole armour and again gives the purpose for doing this. This phrase begins with ἵνα followed by δύναμαι. The verb δύναμαι, which means to be able, or withstand, denotes a defensive and not an attacking posture (Hoehner, 2002:833). Hoehner, (2002:832) states the purpose of armour is to assist believers to stand against evil cosmic powers (verses 11-12).

4.3.2.2 Ancient interpretation

Jerome85 (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:198-199) did the Early Church interpretation of most of the Bible, and his work on the Ephesian text cannot be ignored. In the present study, his interpretation of the phrase, to stand in the evil day, is two-fold. Firstly, it may refer to the final consummation and judgment when the enemy will have to fight to keep believers in his control. Secondly, it also may serve as an encouragement to the Ephesians to stand in the faith of the gospel, and not lapse under temptations and persecutions. Thus, he appears to contend with the two views, suggesting the phrase stands for both the final Day of Judgment and, also for the present age. Ambrosiaster, (in Edwards [ed.], 1999:199) on the other hand, complements Jerome’s interpretation by going further to interpret the phrase, the whole armour of God. He seems to insinuate believers are at war with vicious foes who are skillful in every deception. So, they must be alert for spiritual combat, using weapons of sobriety and self-denial to subjugate the combatant spirits. However, it appears that Ambrosiaster understands the warfare will thrive in the present age, while Jerome absolves the two views.

4.3.2.3 Medieval interpretation

Aquinas (in Lamb [Trans.], 1966:239) interprets the text from the immediate context, citing Paul's explanation of the devil's snares in (6:12) and in verse 13 advises Ephesians to arm themselves. In verse 14 he elucidates the categories of weapons. Indeed, Paul seems to depict evil and wicked powers lurking out there, so, he cautions the Ephesian, therefore take up the 85 Was an Early church priest, confessor, theologian and historian, best known for his Bible translation that came to be known as the Vulgate (https://www.google.com/search?q=who+was+jerome%23) whole armour of God, that is, take up spiritual weapons ready for combat. Why? “For the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh but have divine power to destroy strongholds.” (2 Cor. 10:4)

It is therefore critical for Paul to admonish the believers to take up the whole armour so that you may be able to withstand, that is, to resist the devil (James 4:7). He interprets in the evil day from the perspective of what takes place in it. In other words, the believers were encouraged to prepare beforehand for the battle because the days are evil. So follows the phrase, and to stand firm in all things perfect, in hardship and progress, trusting perfectly in the grace of Jesus Christ. Indeed, by the phrase, everything perfect, Aquinas (in Lamb [Trans.], 1966:240-41) appears to mean sufficiency in salvation. That is, the total will with the Father, striving to withdraw from passing realities and progressing towards the imperishable.

Aquinas (in Lamb [Trans.], 1966:241) seems to anticipate an imminent battle with the devil and his retinue as a present reality in the lives of believers. The reliance on God for spiritual blessings is critical during this difficult time. However, Aquinas (in Lamb [Trans.], 1966:242) appears not quite clear on the eschatological battle but is emphatic on the present life.

4.3.2.4 Reformation interpretation

About the evil day, Brenz (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) suggests that “the day is not evil in itself but because of the evil temptation that every temple [of the human body] is full of,” such as carnal minds and issues of faith and practice. Calvin (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) concurs with Brenz (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) that Paul was exhorting the Ephesians to arm themselves against evil temptations. Thus, Calvin (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) claims that the phrase, you may be able, suggests a promise of victory, implying resolve to withstand the devil by putting on the whole armour of God to fight to the end. Calvin (in Bray [ed.], 2011:402) is emphatic that Paul was likely insinuating that anyone properly armed against Satan will never be defeated in his spiritual journey. Thus, Calvin and Brenz look like they understood the evil day to signify the present life of believers full of dangerous carnal adversaries.

4.3.2.5 Modern interpretation

4.3.2.5.1 “On Account of this, take up the full armour of God” (Διὰ τοῦτο ἀναλάβετε τὴν πανοπλίαν τοῦ θεοῦ)

Eadie (1861:474-75), asserts that the charge, take up the whole armour (panoply) of God, is loaded with military aphorisms first mentioned in verse 11. He further stresses that the Christian armour is worn to encounter the enemy on the evil day. Moule, (1902:327-328) alludes to this fact, and further states that putting on the panoply of God is a necessity to enable the believers to withstand formidable opponents in the evil day, such as the crisis of temptation or terror. Gore (1923:242) seems to bring to the fore another perspective of the armour of God as something like the righteousness of God, which is Christ, the believers’ armour. So, by putting on Christ’s as armour, the believers are guaranteed victory in the hour of evil. Thus, Gore unlike other commentators so far has not only likened armour to Christ’s righteousness but has gone on to appropriate it as clothing for believers.

In addition, Barth, (1974:762) contends that this armour “is equated with the new man who in Romans 13:12, 14 and Gal. 3:27 is identified with Christ”. Barth (1974:764) further adds an adjective splendid, to describe this armour so that he interprets the phrase as, put on the splendid armour in order to be able, to signify that the believers are able as long as they take up the unique armour given to them.

Stott, (1979:275) goes on to describe the armour, and further claims that the phrase, the whole armour of God, translates the Greek word panoplia (the full armour of a heavy-armed soldier), referred to as divine armour. This may compare with Barth’s (1974: 762) description of splendid armour equated with the new man analogy of putting on Christ (Rom. 13:12). The emphasis on the divineness rather than just panoplia appears to indicate that panoplia is God’s. That is, God shares it with believers by putting it on as they march on to war against evil powers. An illustration by Stott (1979:276) of a Puritan minister William Gurnall in Suffolk in 1655 might help understand a divine panoplia:

“...In heaven, we shall appear not in armour but in robes of glory, but here they (the pieces of armour specified) are to be worn night and day; we must walk, work and sleep in them, or else we are not true soldiers of Christ. In this armour, we are to stand and watch, and never relax our vigilance, for the saint’s sleeping time is Satan’s tempting time; every fly dares venture to creep on sleeping lion.”

Gurnall’s claim that we must walk and sleep in them appears to summarize Stott’s perspectives of the divine armour of putting on the whole armour of God (Stott, 1979:276).

Thus, Lincoln (1990:442) likens the armour analogy with putting on the new humanity by putting off the old self (Ephesians 4:25), a fact observed above as putting on Christ. Therefore, believers are solemnly encouraged to take up the full armour of God and appropriate the divine resources (pieces of armour) ensuing from it (Lincoln, 1990:445). So, to Lincoln, like Stott (1979:275), the full armour is divine and sums up divine resources. Thus, the full armour is critical to withstand ἀντιστῆναι or resist the devil in the evil day. Thus, Hoehner (2002:832), argues that putting on the full armour connotes putting on weapons to contend against the assaults of the devil. Indeed, Hoehner (2002:831) asserts that the use of imperative, take up (ἄναλόβετε), may suggest urgency on the part of the believers who were described in the preceding verses as being in the battle with heavenly evil forces.

4.3.2.5.2 “So that you may be able to resist in the evil day” (ἵνα δυνηθῆτε ἀντιστῆναι ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ)

Eadie (1861:475) interprets ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ as a day of the definite satanic attack in terms of damaged reputation, bitter repentance, and recollections of the past. It is a preview of the ultimate evil amongst humanity, marked by persecution and apostasy, indeed a time of desperate terror for weak believers (Findlay, 1892:412). Thus, Findlay (1892:412) undoubtedly appears to bend more towards pronouncing the evil day as a foretaste of the last things, putting him on a collision course with Eadie (1861:475) who seems to claim the evil day is not futuristic.

Thus, Barth (1974:804-05) observes, “As much as Ephesians expresses a realized eschatology of salvation, it also speaks of the experience of eschatological tribulations at present. The struggle against the spiritual hosts of evil is necessary now, just because it anticipates and participates in, the final opposition of God to all evil and God’s victory over it.” Thus, Lincoln, (1990:445) intimates Paul’s warning his readers against complacency in the face of threats of evil principalities of this world.

But the phrase, in the evil day, has been faulted on its actual meaning. Indeed, the dispute has been long-standing throughout the subsequent years. Three case scenarios will suffice. In one instance, Lincoln (1990:445-46) proposes four competing interpretations. Firstly, shortly before Parousia (events immediately preceding the eschaton); secondly, any time of crisis or an extraordinary temptation; thirdly, a reference to the entire present age and fourthly, which is favoured, a synthesis of first and third interpretations. The readers are to awaken to the fact that they are in the evil days, which will culminate “a final time of evil at the end of history” (Lincoln, 1990:446). Thus, Lincoln like Findlay (1892:412) and Barth (1974:804-05) appear to combine present and indefinite future. Thus argues Lincoln, (1990:446) that this evil day is a current phenomenon in the lives of humanity and there will also be the last day of evil. So, the armour will be necessary to enable believers’ battle with evil now and in the future. The believers’ ought therefore to stand firm, having accomplished preparations for battle.

In the second case, Hoehner (2002:833) claims that ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ in the evil day has five contentious interpretations. Firstly, satanic outbreak immediately before Parousia; secondly, entire period of believer’s life/the whole of the present age (5:16); thirdly, critical times in believer’s life; fourthly, combines views 1 and 2, present time (evil day) that will culminate in the final spate of evil in a future), and fifthly, combines views 2 and 3 – refers to present age compounded with perilous times of satanic events against believers. Hoehner (2002:834) suggests the fifth view to be most representative as it alerts believers to be prepared for both everyday evils as well as in times of heightened spiritual battles. Hoehner, thus, appears to stand in solidarity with Eadie at this point, whereby majority of the preceding commentators seem to suggest evil days are now and in the unpredictable future in the present day believers’ lifetime.

A third case has been cited by Arnold, (2010:449-450) in which he views, firstly, events immediately preceding the Parousia as one of the many evil days (5:16) or secondly, extraordinary trials in the lives of believers. Arnold appears content with the last view which he claims to have support from the majority of commentators. He seems to be of the opinion that vv. 11-12 and vv. 14-18 portray a context of how to achieve victory and that believers haven't already worn. However, it is certain believers will face demonic attacks in the present age. Thus called upon to prepare, to stand from falling into temptations and advance the good news of deliverance on enemy territory.

It would appear like Arnold, Eadie and Hoehner’s stance seems to depict this evil day is the present age of the Ephesian believers. While Findlay, Barth, and Lincoln, although staunch supporters of the present time, certainly appear to have an indefinite future in mind. This is also the mind of the researcher because it is difficult to delineate and confine the evil day to only present-day believers, without anticipating an ultimate battle with the devil and its entourage in the indefinite future.

4.3.2.5.3 “And having done everything, to stand” (καὶ κατεργασάμενοι ἅπαντα, στῆναι)

Eadie, (1865:475) argues that some classical writers used κατεργασάμενοι to mean having subdued and others having done all or accomplished all. However, Eadie (1861:476) challenges the former assertion and indicates that verses 11 and 14 signify to stand, not when the combat is over, but to stand before the foe, in the very attitude of resistance and self-defense, or in expectation of an immediate assault. Certainly, he gets support from the subsequent verses, stand, therefore (verse 14-17), with a belt of truth, breastplate, shoes, shield, helmet, and sword and praying all times. This interpretation seems to make sense in the light of descriptions of the elements of warfare that suggest the emphatic need for a complete military attire, which would be illogical when the battle is over.

Also, Findlay, (1892:410-411) appears to capture the term, stand, as the watchword for this warfare where Gentile believers were encouraged to hold their ground. This strategic defense is required to withstand in the evil day, which is more than daily temptations that co-exist within humanity. By using the words, more than daily temptations, Findlay, (1892:411) seems to interpret the clause to insinuate Paul’s foreseeing imminent danger over the infant Church of Christ. Maybe he had in mind the 64-70 AD crisis that extended from the fire of Rome to the fall of Jerusalem, a time that might look like the Day of Judgment for Israel and the ancient world. Indeed, persecution of the young church by the Roman Emperors beginning with Nero and ending under Constantine could be a further reference point, that battle is an ongoing concern.

Moule (1902:328) further seems to suggest that when believers have accomplished all the preparation for the battle, to stand firm, unmoved, unshaken, and ready to engage and tread down the enemies. With regard to, stand, in verse 13 and 14 Barth (1974:764) claims it carries the sense of verse 11, that is, to resist in the present-day warfare against the devil on earth.

Regarding the phrase, having done everything, Barth (1974:765) argues it has duplicate meanings like to carry to victory, to defeat, to finish a job. Thus, Barth (1974:766) claims that nowhere in the New Testament has ‘everything’ (katergazomai) been used to mean, to conquer, to subdue but to prepare (2 Cor.5:5) or to accomplish (Rom 7:15-20), i.e. to work out, to bring about, to effect (2 Cor. 9:11; Philippians 2:12). He further contends that it is unlikely for Paul to speak of the result of the battle in verse 13 and then in verse 14 to go on to discuss the fundamental standpoint during the combat, unless the words κατεργασάμενοι ἅπαντα (having done everything) somewhat summarizes the preparations for warfare.

In interpreting this phrase, Hoehner (2002:834) suggests that the reason for putting on the full armour of God is to help the believers to resist in the evil time and having accomplished all, to stand. Hoehner (2002:835) suggests two versions of this phrase. The first claim conveys the idea that victory has been achieved so that believers can stand. The second one suggests that since all preliminaries are complete, believers are to stand/against the devil’s attack. This is the most preferred stance because believers are urged to stand as they are prepared to engage the enemy (Hoehner, 2002:836). So, the preferred interpretation of this phrase is to prepare for the battle as opposed to subdue or conquer. This claim is consistent with most scholars.

4.3.2.6 Appraisal of interpretation of Ephesians 6:13 by Brethren

4.3.2.6.1 “On account of this, take up the full armour of God.”

Indeed, most scholars like Stott (1979:275), Barth (1964:762), and Lincoln (1990:442) have identified panoply with Jesus Christ. Thus, putting on the full panoply of God has been likened to putting on Christ, in what is further compared to putting on the new clothes and putting off the old ones. These are similar words said by Brethren after getting born again and frequently accompanies their public testimonies in their Christian journey. Most of their testimonies attest to the concept of overcoming a spiritual enemy and sometimes real adversaries of Brethren fellowship. They tend to describe their weapons, in the words of Paul in 2 Cor. 10:4, “For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty to God unto the pulling down of fortifications, destroying counsels” (2 Cor. 10:4). This verse seemed to be key to Aquinas’ theology of spiritual warfare (Aquinas, in Lamb [Trans.], 1966:239).

Thus, Brethren embrace various pieces of armour almost literally. Certainly, research respondents/participants in Mount Kenya central and Embu, claim that this text was used by Kusimama (Stand) group to encourage Christians to withstand challenges. They often use the phrase Yesu atosha (Jesus satisfies) signifying their need of Jesus in their lives. Thus, thirst for righteousness and the Word of God have continued to challenge their passion for fellowship, evangelism, and mission. No wonder Joe Church (1981:62), one of the pioneers of EARM, wrote a book ‘Every Man a Bible Student’. Certainly, Brethren love to read the Bible, albeit devotionally, a fact they could have borrowed from Keswick teaching which emphasized: “on personal devotion and service, rather than on theological understanding” (Reed, 2007:58). This led to the exegetical challenge of the scripture, a fact observed by Guillebaud (2002:73-4) that evangelical scholarship was largely missing. Indeed most of the Keswick exponents were not theologically equipped, except few like Handley Carr Glyn Moule who was a Professor of Divinity and Principal of Ridley Theological College at Cambridge, and later Bishop of Durham (Pollock, 1964:68).

Brethren understand the whole armour as a full regalia for spiritual warfare. Thus, commentators like Gore (1923:242), writing in the early twentieth century, did not only liken armour with Christ’s righteousness but as clothing for believers too. Also, Stott’s viewpoint of walking and sleeping in them – panoply no doubt summarizes Brethren’s perspective. Thus, Brethren urge their members not to leave behind any weapon of war until all the enemies are vanquished, now and in the future. Indeed, this is attested to by their testimonies that have the past, present and future components.

4.3.2.6.2 “So that you may be able to resist in the evil day, and having done everything, to stand.”

Brethren do not regard the phrase, in the evil day, as having eschatological perspectives, as some scholars like Jerome and Aquinas appear to conceive it, but a present reality as understood by scholars like Eadie, Arnold and Hoehner. This reality seems to have been internally and externally perpetuated.

Internally, in the 1960s and 1970s the re-awakening wave of Balokole inspired by the interpretation of Ephesian 5:14- Awake, O sleeper… infiltrated the Kenyan soil splitting the Kenyan EARM, fondly referred to as Brethren86, into two main factions. One came to be referred to as the Arise or Awakened, and the other came to be called the Stand, derived from Ephesian 6:13 – to stand [firm] (in the original faith of the EARM). The Stand faction faced severe tribulations from the Arise faction accusing them of being dead, and therefore should arise. Thus, Embu respondents contend that Kusimama (Stand) group was formed after some Brethren disagreed with Kufufuka, especially on issues of obtaining bank loans, which Kusimama endorses. Indeed, Kamau (2001:22) states that Kusimama is the largest group of Brethren in the Mount Kenya region, and for that matter, the term Brethren, by and large represents their views. As observed by one major stakeholder (participant) most of the Anglican leaders including bishops, identify themselves with the Stand, probably because Stand appears to work relatively harmoniously with the church hierarchy.

86 It is critical to indicate that Arise and Stand factions appear to coexist mutually today in their local Brethren fellowships, though they tend to hold separate conventions nationally, and in

Externally, there were at least three factors. The first wave of tribulation came mainly from a section of the Anglican Church, which was not happy with Brethren beliefs and practices. Although Stand did not break away like Johera in western Kenya, in the 1950s, following unfair treatment by the church hierarchy (Ogot, 1966:43, 57), this conflict has continued to date, mainly due to a consistent claim by the Brethren, that clergy are not saved. As a result, some clergy has refused to recognize Brethren’s ministry in the church. Thus, a passive stand phenomenon threatens the wellbeing of Brethren’s lifestyle. The day of evil appear to persist to date and might go on to unforeseeable future. If not checked, this day might annihilate them, as the population of Brethren has continued to dwindle.

The second wave of the perceived day of evil analogy for Brethren came with the struggle for independence in Kenya. Indeed, some adherents were martyred for refusing to join forces against the colonial regime. Others were persecuted for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, saying they had drunk the blood of Jesus, they would not drink the blood of goats (Gitari, 2014:185). In this regard, it would look like their day of evil was at that present time. But the point is, they stood firm in their faith in the face of persecution.

It is like the Brethren had read Aquinas’ (1966:239-240) interpretation of this phrase. If it is matter of salvation, they practise daily sanctification as if it is the presence of God in their lives. They daily walk in the light as if it is withdrawal from the world (the passing reality) in pursuit of the infinite, they are in the glory train towards heaven, other Christians are locked out.

The third wave concerns isolation and stigma by the general society. Brethren appear to face the wrath from society for refusing to participate in some social gatherings. A group of participants in this research in Kirinyaga, said they refuse to attend some meetings because they perceive traditional rituals performed during such get-togethers invoke ancestral spirits the Eastern African region. So, the use of the term Brethren, in this study, unless specifically stated, will incorporate the two factions.
(which they regard to be evil). By refusing to attend such meetings, Brethren lose opportunities for evangelism and mission. This attitude has also led to their weak impact in the socio-economic activities, and many of them remain poor.

However, it is important to note that, Brethren’s testimony seems to answer the question of spiritual warfare that they encountered then and now. A standard text frequently used by Brethren has been, “and they have conquered him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, for they loved not their lives even unto death” (Rev. 12:11). Certainly, one of the favourite Brethren songs has been, kaza mwendo, utasinda (Be steadfast in your walk [with the Lord], you will be victorious), which seems to allude to the fact that nothing shall prevail against the power of God. So, Calvin (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) and Brenz (in Bray [ed.], 2011:401) writing during the Reformation era, appeared to insinuate that Paul was exhorting the Ephesians to arm themselves against evil temptations. This could have encouraged Brethren to stay away from situations that could compromise their faith. It could also reinforce Brethren’s bold testimonies of daily trials and temptations. Indeed, they see putting on armour, as a prelude to the prevalent battle, not only amidst internal wrangles but also from the Anglican Church, which they accuse of supposedly being lukewarm.

4.3.2.7 Missiological perspectives on Brethren’s interpretation of the Ephesians 6:13

The putting on a panoply as a righteousness of God’s motive to stand against the evil day, has been the keynote subject for the Stand faction in particular, and later for the entire Brethren Fellowship, in general. Surely, the appropriation of panoply as a cloth of righteousness, to stand against evil, is a common subject/testimony during Brethren’s weekly revival fellowships. This subject has been used against the perceived perpetrators of evil. Thus, Brethren explicates the subject in the two-word phrase, stand firm, clothed in the splendid armour of righteousness, as to contend with the evil powers.

The concern of the Stand (Brethren unless stated otherwise) is to stand firm against the present evil whether imagined or real. Thus, Bosch (1991:508) claims that “we need an eschatology for a mission which is both future-directed and oriented to the here and now… an eschatology that holds in creative and redemptive tension the already and the not yet…moves in all three times: past, present, and future. The reign of God has already come, is coming, and will come in fullness”. This observation seems consonant with Brethren method of sharing a testimony, which is based on the past (status before salvation), present (sojourn with Christ), and future (the fullness of time, when the Son of man will return). This indicates their struggle is not only current, but futuristic (indefinite), or as they call it before the Son of Man returns. To Brethren, the uncertain future signifies the end of their earthly life (when Jesus comes to take them home), which should not be confused with the last events before the end of the world. Indeed, Livingston’s (2013:256) differentiation is worth noting:

“Traditionally understood, eschatology means the doctrine of last things, pointing to the end of time… Understood in terms of the Second Coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the final judgment, the coming of the kingdom, and the future states of heaven and hell. Within much of modern theology, however, eschatology is used to refer to the power of God in Christ through the Spirit working out his purposes within world history as well as beyond it.”

Certainly, Brethren’s commonly sung hymn during their fellowship is, kaza mwendo, ndugu yangu, Yesu yuaja kutusukua (be steadfast, my friend, Jesus is coming back to take us home). This compares with, “and they have conquered him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, for they loved not their lives even unto death” (Rev. 12:11). This appraisal is consistent with the Brethren adherents who were martyred for refusing to join Mau Mau forces against the colonial regime (Gitari, 2014:185). This assertion is also supported by Stand’s constant firm stand against distractors like Uriukio on one hand, and some Anglican Church members, on the other. Thus, Brethren’s eschatological perspective in the light of Livingston’s definition, appears to tilt towards the modern view.

One of Livingston’s (2013:273) models see the kingdom of God, “as invisibly present in the hearts of true believers - with a corresponding lack of interest in the institutional church”. Undoubtedly, this model, which Livingston (2013:274) call pietists (a renewal movement within Protestantism), believed that “the true church was… the small, authentic church within the larger institutional church” that sought to convert persons into their little communities of true believers – fundamentally spiritual mission was their concern, and not social action issues. So, Livingston argues further (2013:274), with regard to this model, “the eschatological kingdom of the future was a glorious reality, but the present dimension of the kingdom was privatized: the kingdom became an individual, inward and invisible experience of the believer with his or her Lord”. Thus, this mission theory and practice somewhat reflect the prevailing situation of Brethren, who sometimes excuse themselves from the missional church function to attend their own missions.

4.3.3 Historical development of interpretation of 1 Cor. 11:13-15

“Judge for yourselves: is it proper for a woman to pray to God with her head uncovered? Does not the very nature of things teach you that if a man has long hair, it is a disgrace to him, but that if a woman has long hair, it is her glory? For long hair is given to her for a covering” (13 ἐν ὑμῖν αὐτοῖς κρίνατε· πρέπον ἐστὶν γυναῖκα ἀκατακάλυπτον τῷ θεῷ προσεύχεσθαι; 14 οὐδὲ ἢ φύσις αὐτή διδάσκει ὑμᾶς ὅτι ἀνὴρ μὲν ἐὰν κομῇ, ἀτιμία αὐτῷ ἐστιν, 15 γυνὴ δὲ ἐὰν κομῇ, δόξα αὐτή ἐστιν; ὅτι ἡ κόμη ἀντὶ περιβολαίου δέδοται).

4.3.3.1 Historical setting of 1 Corinthians

Corinth’s rise from ruin is traced to Julius Caesar in 44 BCE (Sampley, 2002:775; and Gill, 2002:105). This fact is collaborated by Winter (2001:8-9) who further claims that following its destruction by the Romans in 146 BCE, it was redesigned and reconstructed 102 years later in the manner of the Romans cultural architectural taste, becoming a new Roman city (Winter, 2001:9). Sampley (2002:774) claims that it enjoyed colonial status signifying its unique connection with the Roman Empire operatives. Winter (2001:12) and Sampley (2002:774) observe that the official government language was Latin. Indeed, Winter (2001:13) notes that magistrates were indulged against replying to Greeks apart from in Latin.

In Paul’s era, Corinth was not only a centre of commerce (Mare, 1976:176) and religious diversities, but also the principal city in the province. Indeed, Sampley (2002:774) argues that during the reign of Emperor Claudius (41-54 CE) Corinth had a higher status than Athens as a key administrative hub of the Roman Province of Achaia. This suggests that Corinth thrived within the context of Roman laws and dictums of the imperial cult (Sampley, 2002:773-74). Gill (2002:105) concurs, and asserts that the Roman colony of Corinth “housed the cult to the Roman emperors.” Indeed, argues Gill (2002:105), Julius Caesar was deified in 44 BCE, and subsequent emperors beginning with his adopted son, Augustus enjoyed divinity status.

Moreover, Corinth was reputed for having somewhat superficial cultural life, which Sampley (2002:775) claims, was an aftermath of Julius Caesar’s restoration of Corinth in 44 BCE, which allowed entry of migrants into the city, besides sailors’ lifestyle, which led to Corinth’s reputation as a sin city. No wonder Mare (1976:176) claims that Aristophanes used the term korinthiazomai to express a notion of losing a life, i.e., “to live like a Corinthian in the practice of sexual immorality”.

Thus, Mare (1976:176) and Sampley (2002:776) argue that Paul87 arrived in this immoral city in 50 CE (Acts 11) and suggest that 1 Corinthians88 is written from Ephesus (1Cor. 16:8, cf. Acts 87 It is important to add that authorship of 1 Corinthians is credited to Paul. Indeed, Mare (1976:179) claims early Christian writers like Clements of Rome and Polycarp appear to acknowledge Paul’s authorship. Verbrugge (2008:248) claims Paul’s authorship of 1 Corinthians has been uncontested, probably because of its strong textual evidence (1:1; 16:21; 1:14; 3:6). However, Gill (2002:108) indicates Paul and Sosthenes, a Corinthian synagogue ruler (Acts 18:17) as joint authors, though Paul appeals to his apostleship role. This appeal could suggest Paul’s principal authorship in retrospect of Sosthens designation as our brother.

18:18-19) following the establishment of the mission there. Sampley (2002:775) adds that Junius Gallio arrived in Corinth in 51 CE as Roman governor of the province of Achaia (Acts 18:12-17), and mentions Jews taking him a case against Paul. Furthermore, Mare (1976:176) contends that Gallio was in office in the first half of 52 CE, meaning he must have started his proconsulship by July 1st, 51 CE, “being the time each year when Roman proconsuls took office”. Furthermore, Gill (2002:106) argues that the presence of Gallio can fix the date because, “An inscription from the sanctuary of Apollo at Delphi shows that he was the governor in Greece when Claudius had obtained Tribunician power twelve times and had been acclaimed emperor twenty-six times. From other inscriptions, these events place the Delphi inscription between the end of 51 and August 52 CE (when he was acclaimed emperor for the twenty-seventh time).” This is further collaborated by Verbrugge’s (2008:247-48) claim that “an inscription found at Delphi mentions Gallio as proconsul of Achaia during the period of Claudius’s twenty-sixth acclamation as emperor. Thus, most scholars’ hold that Gallio was proconsul from July 1, AD 51, to June 30, AD 52”. Therefore, the preceding discussion seems to place Paul’s arrival between 51 and 52 CE and is consistent with the historical Junius Gallio proconsulship and Claudius’s specific crowning as emperor.

This, argues Sampley (2002:777), could have happened a few years “after Paul had left Corinth in late summer of 51… The likely date for writing 1 Corinthians would be late fall or winter of 53-54 CE”. This range appears likely in light of Gill’s (2002:101) and Verbrugge’s (2008:248) claim of a date in 55 CE, from Ephesus (16:5-9). So, it seems safe to suggest that Paul wrote 1 Corinthians sometimes in 55 CE, about three years following his arrival in Corinth.

That aside, it is said that the Corinthian congregation was made up of Jews and Gentiles Mare (1976:177). Sampley (2002:777) and Verbrugge (2008:244) further claimed that the congregation of believers were poor – lower socioeconomic class (1 Cor. 1:26), and that the rich among them sometimes treated the lower class believers shamefully (1 Cor. 11:17-34). Furthermore, Sampley (2002:778) argues that Paul depicts Gentile believers as not only the majority in the Corinthian congregation but describes them as former idolaters (1 Cor. 12:2). Besides, Verbrugge (2008:244) indicates gentile believers’ loathed eating food implicated or associated with the worship of idols, which to them, was tantamount to honouring pagan gods. Thus, to effectively incorporate these Gentiles into people of God, Sampley (2002:778) describes their re-socialization so that they would perceive themselves as a segment of “the Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16).

88 Sampley (2002:776) contends that what the Bible refers to as 1 Corinthians is Paul’s second letter. The first letter, the so-called previous letter (1 Cor. 5:9-12) cannot be traced. This is what is referred to by Mare (1976:178) as the sorrowful letter (2 Cor. 2:4; 7:8, 9).
That being the case, 1 Corinthians had to subject itself into the cultural milieu of Paul’s day. This puts 1 Cor. 11:2-16 into its proper perspective concerning the interpretation that cultural norms constitute elements of honour or shame. Surely, Sampley (2002:782) observes that the most significant cultural norm in Paul’s era was to pursue what promotes honour and to minimize what brings shame, in the context where society was hierarchically structured. The lower strata or the subordinate persons were expected to praise and honour the ones at the helm of leadership. Accordingly, Sampley (2002:782) argues that arrangements of seats at the social gathering were carefully allocated according to the grade of status and shame was accorded anyone who went against the decorum.

4.3.3.2 Immediate Context

It is apparent from the above that some Christians in Corinth were offended by their fellow believers eating meat that had been sacrificed to idols. This sets into perspective the Roman background into which the church is founded and nurtured. No doubt Paul appears to reinforce issues of common decency to avoid backlash from the apparently disgruntled believers who had just left pagan worship. Certainly, issues of decorum in worship, just like eating meat offered to idols were contentious. Indeed, observes Verbrugge (2008:350-51), matters of head covering, as propriety in worship has been a contentious issue which triggers various interpretations. It is thus, audacious to suggest with finality, in this short section, the crux of the text (11:2-16). Indeed, 11:13-15 is considered by the researcher as the thrust of this text, which is viewed as a precis of the entire text.

Winter (2001:121) in reference to 11:4 (veiling of men) appears to castigate the view that this passage is about the veiling of women. Citing D.W.J. Gill, Winter (2001:121-122) depicts “the Roman convention of men covering their heads while praying and offering up libations....” Winter (2001:122) and Gill (2002:157) observe that evidence of men wearing a toga over their heads “while praying or offering a libation to a god or gods” is found in Corinth. It was the prerogative of the social elite including emperors to wear a veil while offering up a sacrifice. This meant that only the persons taking a leadership role in a pagan ritual veiled their heads. But, Winter (2001:123) states that, though it isn’t only the elite that prophesied, this culture spread to the Christian community so that “they covered their heads after the manner of the pagan priests,” a concept that appears to have attracted the lower strata of the society. Certainly, claims Mare (1976:256) women believers attending church in an unveiled head would mostly create confusion to whether one is mourning or have committed adultery. Indeed, Winter (2001:128) asserts that an unveiled wife is regarded as a woman who has been shorn (11:5), conventionally equated to an adulterous woman, who should have her hair shaved in the manner of a prostitute.

Thus, at the founding of the Roman Corinth, the royal values accorded to Roman wives found themselves challenged through what Winter (2001:123) calls new wives who could now compete with those they were hitherto customarily differentiated from. This led to an inevitable revolt by the Roman wives of social status against customary and prejudiced values.

Winter (2001:126) argues that the term, a wife or a woman (γυνή) falls within ages 14 to 16 years, and were considered ideal ages for the Roman girls to marry in the first century. Since single girls aged 16 and below were not allowed to speak in an open gathering, they were unlikely to have prayed or prophesied publicly. So the term γυνή, as used by Paul (11:2ff) “would not include the pre-teen or the unmarried woman in her early teens” (Winter, 2001:126-127). This is collaborated by Verbrugge (2008:351), although he appears cautious that it could also refer to unmarried females.

However, Winter (2001:127) suggests that the word veil in this context indicates the subjects under discussion were married women. This is because “the marriage ceremony involved what was called in Greek veiling the bride...and taking off the veil of a bride was one of the essential components of marriage. It was the social indicator by which the marital status of a woman was made clear to everyone” (Winter, 2001:127). Thus, unveiled woman in public company argues Verbrugge (2008:354) may attract men’s attention, which could even be more distracting and indecorous in a worship context.

So, adds Winter (2001:127), Paul used the terms veil and woman together to indicate she is married, meaning a widow would not be required to wear her bridal veil. Thus, any mention of a woman and a veil to a first-century person signifies a married lady. It appears then, argues Winter (2001:127), “the issue here was married women praying and prophesying without their veil in the Christian meeting”. The core issue claims Winter (2001:128) is that the text does neither suggest every married woman attending the meeting uncovers her head nor does it suggest every man covers his head but addresses those who were praying and prophesying with their heads uncovered or covered.

89 “An adulterous wife should be shorn or have her head shaved as a punishment intended to humiliate her publicly” (Winter, 2001:128).

90 This is best described by a conventional speech, the bedroom speech, at the marriage bed of two wedded couple. “Plutarch, writing in the first century A.D, provides an example of such a speech delivered to two young friends. It demanded of the woman’s religious faithfulness to her husband’s gods and the acceptance of his casual sexual encounters with a maidservant or with high-class prostitutes at dinners.... These sexual liaisons were a means of gratifying lust, for he loved his wife and it would be inappropriate for him to find this sexual release with her....” (Winter, 2001:124).
Having placed the text into its historical perspective, the crux of the study will now proceed to the analysis of commentaries by various scholars.

4.3.3.3 Ancient interpretation

In expounding this text, several ancient church writers demonstrate aversion for practices that go against the natural law. Chrysostom (in Bray [ed.], 1999:106) portrays Paul’s appeal to the social convention which is palpable to barbarians and wonders what’s wrong with the Corinthians who can’t acknowledge the obvious. Thus, on one end of the continuum, Augustine (in Bray [ed.], 1999:106) questions why men wear long hair contrary to the Pauline teachings, while on the other end, Clement of Alexandria terms profane and misleading attitudes of women wearing wigs [hairpiece]. Indeed, Clement of Alexandria’s (in Bray [ed.], 1999:107) further laments requires restating: “If a man is the head of the woman, is it not impious for her to deceive him with all that extra hair and at the same time offend the Lord by dressing like a harlot, when her natural hair is so beautiful?”

4.3.3.4 Reformation interpretation

Calvin (in Pringle [Trans.], 1948:361), one of the 16th-century reformers, appears to clarify the relationship between the sexes and affirms its authorship is God. So, male and female “ought with humility to accept and maintain the condition which the Lord has assigne[...]

4.3.3.5 Modern Interpretation

The phrase, judge for yourself, is viewed by Fitzmyer (2008:420) as Paul’s concluding argument as he appears to revert to vv. 4-6, to ask rhetorical questions vv. 13-14. In answering the first question, Paul tends to depict the proper decorum in which a woman addresses God in prayer, vis-à-vis to merely praying in a holy gathering (v. 5). Paul’s concern here seems to arise from woman’s search for parity with man displayed by her uncovered head.
The second question contends Fitzmyer (2008:420) appeals to nature, φύσις which Paul personifies as an instructor of humanity. But, Fitzmyer (2008:420) notes, unfortunately, that the general order of nature (instructor) has been somewhat overshadowed by the social convention. So, in unpacking the phrase, does not the very nature of things teach you? (Οὐδὲ ἡ φύσις).

Ellicott (1887:207) appears to state that the term φύσις denotes the outward more than an inward feeling, but adds that Οὐδὲ seems to appeal “to the support given to the inward feeling by the light supplied by the general order of nature”. Also, Garland (2003: 530) points out that nature, ἡ φύσις to Paul, refers to male and female hairdos that conform to expectations of his society. Of interest, in this case, is the apparent notion that Roman men kept short hair.

Indeed, Ellicott (1887:208) recognizes that men in antique times used to wear various lengths of hair depending on their natural background. For instance, Hebrew men wore hair short, though they were well aware long hair was fashionable (2 Sam.14:26). Also, Greek men initially had long hair, but subsequently primarily short. Likewise, Romans after 300 BCE had short hair, a fact affirmed by Beet (1902:187). In addition, Edwards (1885:281) notes men keeping long hair had been reckoned as a mark of honour among the upper classes in Athens though it was later tainted with pride. Thus, Ellicott (1887:208) avers, “in early Christian days short hair was the mark of the Christian teacher, as contrasted with the usual long hair of the heathen philosopher”. In other words, short hairdos for men were the acceptable/honourable social convention. Indeed, argues Garland (2003:531) the general social connotation in Roman Corinth is that men with long hair were effeminate, unnatural and showed signs of moral perversion. Garland (2003:531) further observes that long hair in Roman context depicted the relationship of the wife to her husband. Thus, Fitzmyer (2008:420) claims that the phrase, wears the hair long, κομάω with regard to men, means more than wearing a beard, a distinguishing mark for the two sexes.

Perhaps Paul’s call for attention to what nature teaches might have been precipitated by Romans’ obedience to natural law, where short hair for men was standard practice. Since men do not use hair as cover (dishonour for them), as a sign from nature it is only women who need this cover. Thus, Corinthian women should follow the hints of nature and cover91 their heads since nature has endowed them with an excellent natural cover.

Surely, the ensuing discussion seems to borrow a cue from the previous interpretations in which divine differentiation of men and women appear to have been epitomized by natural affinities to maleness or femaleness, respectively. So, Barrett (1968:256) contends that nature has made a clear distinction between man and woman in the light of the quantity of hair assigned to each. A

91 This covering περιβόλαιον is depicted as an article of apparel that covers much of the body, such as a cloak or a mantle (Garland, 2003:531) reverse of this difference renders the outcome artificial. Barrett (1968:256-57) goes a step further and observes that a man has hair on the chin and a woman generally has a gentler voice. These signs naturally distinguish the gender.

This being the case, the issue of homosexuality as implied by Barrett (1968:257) that is behind Paul’s arguments shouldn’t arise on the basis of this clear distinction. So, by following their sexes as intended by God, human beings, argues Barrett (1968:257) attain the highest glory. Also, Barrett (1968:257) further observes that Paul did not believe only women should be covered because both sexes ought to cover their nakedness. This is expounded by Edwards (1885:281) later in this study. Barrett (1968:257) however, lays weight on women on the basis of more hair and thus should follow the clue suggested by her naturally long hair.

Heading (1995:163) further depicts Paul’s explication of natural sensitivities of Christians, based on their previous experiences of synagogue services before their conversion. He seems to suggest that this issue was not a spiritual matter, but gives a hint of sensibility that it was shameful for a man to wear long hair. However, as observed by Ellicott (1887:208), it wasn’t an issue as some O.T. texts like 2 Sam. 14:25-26 and Num. 6:5 would show. But, Ezek. 44:20 describes the command for the priest, neither to shave nor keep long hair.

4.3.3.5.2 Long hair, a covering, a woman’s glory

In this section, Paul draws attention to natural modesty which commonly understands woman’s hair as a covering, περιβόλαίον which, Edwards (1885:281) relates, to τὸ πέπλος meaning it is in excess of a veil, κάλυμμα. He further asserts that this veil is worn during prayer to God in addition to the long hair. The intention argues Edward (1885:281), is to mark voluntary adoration towards God in worship, on the one hand, and to distinguish worship from social life, on the other.

As a counterpart to the previous verse, Ellicott (1887:208) elucidates the phrase, for long hair is given to her as a covering (ὅτι ἡ κόμη ἀντὶ περιβολαίου δέδοται), to denote acceptance for women, viewed as a beautiful natural veil. This distinction of sexes (v.15b) argues Beet (1902:186), necessitates women to have more hair and suggests that long hair deprives men the dignity accorded to the tougher sex. That efforts by men to appear like women misinform feminine nature and disgrace men. In addition, he argues that long hair for women draws admiration and is nature’s endowment to them. Beet thus (1902:186) avers:

"Nature has made a visible distinction of the sexes by covering woman’s head with more abundant hair. This teaches that the God of Nature designs the sexes to be distinguished, in the most conspicuous part of their body. This natural distinction is recognized in the general judgment of mankind that it is a dishonour for men or women to assume, in this respect, the appearance of the other sex. Now when men stand uncovered before God and women covered, they accept formally and visibly by their own action this distinction of sex and the position in reference to the other sex which God has given. Whereas, if women appear in public unveiled, they do something to obliterate a distinction visibly and conspicuously by nature in the very growth of their hair. “

Thus, there is no excuse for women to ignore the natural rhythm of things that uphold physical distinction of sexes, just as there is no reason for men to go against this difference.

Therefore, like his predecessors, Heading (1995:163) acknowledges long hair is for woman’s glory covering. He argues that in Greek, περιβολαῖον is a different word from previous verses 4, 5,6,13. This word, contends Heading (1995:163) means something cast around (Heb. 1:12), connoting the hair is a veil of glory and beauty. Since this natural beauty has no spiritual value in the service it requires a second artificial covering; an observation Edwards (1885:281) alluded to earlier.

In advancing the question why a woman should not pray to God uncovered, Garland (2003:530) brings to the fore the adjective uncovered, ἀκατακλυπτος. He suggests that uncovered “does not refer to the woman’s hairstyle but a cover over the head”. The matter raised by Garland (2003:530) regards what is fitting, πρέπειν cover, as contrasted to what is shameful and disgraceful (11:4-5, 14), and what is unnatural (11:14). This concept appears to link to Paul’s appeals to nature to reveal what is fitting or suitable. Therefore, Paul seems to call for social propriety which he appears to link to dishonourable/shameful, ἄτιμία which he distinguishes from glory, δόξα in human social life (Fitzmyer, 2008:421). Besides, Paul depicts v.15 as the ideal conventional display of a woman’s long hair, her glory, as opposed to shaven or uncovered, her disgrace (vv.5b-6). Further, Fitzmyer (2008:421) appears to advance this argument on the fact that long hair for women is given for covering, περιβολόσαιον for her glory. Paul wants her to cover herself when praying in public with a wrap-around cloak. Maybe as previously observed some hairdos were presumed not fitting before God. So, an extra covering was preferred.

Edwards further (1885:281) mentions a significant point which, so far, may help balance this discussion. He observes, “In previous verses, the Apostle has spoken of the man’s shorn head and the woman’s long hair as symbols of subjection, in one case to the man, in the other to 92 Fitzmyer, (2008:421) discredits (Murphy-O’Connor, NJBC, 809) argument that Paul thought long hair was a sign of homosexuality.

93 Fitzmyer, (2008:421) captures an argument by some modern interpreters, like (T. W. Martin, Paul’s Argument, 84) who confuses a testicle, περιβόλαίον with a head covering, an argument completely untenable. This is somewhat linked to the fact that the hair of a woman in this passage is part of female genitalia.
Christ”. That is, man’s long hair is a disgrace, and the woman’s long hair is her beauty. In this case, the subjection of man to Christ’s is his glory and “the woman’s glory consists in being the glory of the man by subjection to him”. That being the case, everyone must abide by the acceptable propriety in sacred assembly and prayers addressed to God.

4.3.3.6 Appraisal of interpretation of 1 Cor. 11:13-15 by Brethren

This phrase resonates with Brethren worldview of dictums from nature that expects a clear gendered social setup. By expounding the phrase, does not the very nature of things teach you? (Οὐδὲ ἡ φύσις), Ellicott (1887:207) seems to bring to the fore the hairstyle as it should be in the eyes of Brethren. Indeed, argues Beet (1902:186), maxims of nature necessitate women to have more hair. Again, he suggests that long hair deprives men of the dignity accorded to the tougher sex. Indeed as Fitzmyer (2008:421) implies, men who wore long hair could easily be branded a homosexual, a thorny issue in the church today especially in the Anglican Church. The GAFCON 2013 meeting in Nairobi expressed need to return to the theology of Brethren Fellowship centred on the repentance of sin, confession of guilt and a desire to make amends. Indeed, this indicates Brethren are not alone in this homosexuality dilemma, which appears to sever the partnerships between Western churches and African churches. In this, Brethren’s dictum of walk in light or suffer isolation might appear like a good thought for the Anglican Communion.

Indeed, issues of sexuality are critical to Brethren and informs separate sitting arrangement of men and women, even in the Fellowship meetings. Even at the end of Fellowship when each of the Brethren is expected to greet one another, embracing of the opposite sex is not expected. In other words, anything that could arouse sexual feelings should be avoided. But some misinformed leaders of revival like Noo contravened this teaching and suffered repercussions. Noo had taught that both sexes could sleep together just because they were believed to be holy [to the pure all things are pure] (Ogot, 1966:30), but unfortunately some engaged in sexual relations. Beside this, seriousness on separation of men and women could have been a lesson from Keswick teachings94. This is in spite of the fact that, early church tradition discouraged women (not necessarily wives) from sitting next to married men at public functions as it was construed they would be sexual companions in the evening (Winter, 2001:128).

94 Pearsall Smith’s leadership in Keswick meetings ended dramatically in 1875 following accusation of adultery (Pollock, 1964:34-37). Thus, the fact that Smith could suffer such a ruthless end to his ministry, for a mere conjecture of sexual impropriety, reflects the hard-line stance on moral code by Keswick precursors of East Africa Revival.
Moreover, Barrett (1968:256) claims that nature has made a clear distinction between man and woman by natural hair apportioned to each. This differentiation appears to apply to the teachings of Brethren because they expect men to have hair as men and women to have hair as women. It is important to indicate here that Brethren’s only need is for the two sexes to glorify God. So, as far as this concept is observed within sound theological perspectives, Brethren deserve a pat on the back.

Again, since women’s abundance of hair is universally accepted, the answer to the rhetorical question, does not the very nature of things teach you? Is affirmative. This confirms Brethren’s years of teachings on this issue. Surely, Brethren might feel vindicated by this study, following the onslaught on the dressing code, particularly by the young generation.

4.3.3.6.2 Long hair, a covering, a woman’s glory

The issue of hair has remained contentious, more so within the Brethren circle where wearing a hairpiece is tantamount to good dressing code. Indeed, Clement of Alexandria (in Bray [ed.], 1999:107) seems to take Paul’s views literally and castigate extra covering. He claims God had already endowed them with their own beautiful natural hair. Why then offend the Lord by wearing like a prostitute (Genesis 38:12-15). In other words, extra cover to Clement was a contradiction to social convention of his day. This to some extent contravenes Brethren who drums support for a cover, understood as a headscarf as opposed to a wig/artificial hair. Indeed, some Brethren advise their women adherents to either cover their long hair or keep it short (11:6), though Paul regards it as shameful. However, with respect to the anti-wig campaign, there could be some influence from the teachings of some early church fathers like Clement of Alexandria.95

But pro-wig interpreters might challenge Clement of Alexandria with regard to what Paul meant by a covering. Indeed, Edwards (1885:281), Heading (1995:163) and Garland (2003:350) associate a covering, περιβολαίον to something more than a veil, a second cover which is cast around (Heb. 1:12). If this is what Paul means, then artificial hair or cloak as a covering for women’s natural hair is not only within the preferred decorum but also theologically informed. This understanding violates Brethren view and somewhat shakes their socio-ethical belief and practice of walking in the light. But it is meant to cover possible impropriety posed by sometimes excessive hairdos and has been embraced by most ladies in church leadership today.

Thus, to avoid hairdos becoming a stumbling block to believers, this extra cover apart from artificial hair might placate Brethren’s point of view. This covering in the context of Brethren is a headscarf, which is fashionable and socio-ethically tenable to them. However, moderate hairstyles and properly tended hair are gaining acceptance. This sounds alarm bells to Keswick ethos that emphasizes simple lifestyle (Pollock, 1964:143).

When it comes to men, the expectations for Brethren is short hair, shaved beards and clean shaven faces. Modest and smart dressing code is a distinguished mark of Brethren. Certainly, one of the bishops who participated in this survey discourages bearded clergy in his diocese. Perhaps a borrowing from Augustine (1999:107) who depicts disgust to men who wear long hair contrary to the teaching of Paul. Edwards (1885:281) and Barrett (1968:257) points out that men too are expected to dress decently and that like ladies they are also symbols of subjection to Christ. As a woman's short hair is disgraceful to Christ, so is man's long hair. Indeed, Ellicott (1887:208) explicates acceptable social convention of men’s short hair exemplified by the fact that Christian teachers wore short hair. Admittedly, Brethren have tried to depict brokenness at the cross of Christ by the way they relate to one another, in the Lord. Indeed, they call their colleagues “muru wa Ithe witu” (my brother in God), “mwari wa Ithe witu” (my sister in God), maybe as a way of displaying their subjection before the Lord Jesus. Thus, in this regard, Brethren display similar striking understanding with the majority of scholars.

4.3.3.7 Missiological perspectives on Brethren's interpretation of the 1 Cor. 11:13-15

Indecorum as an exclusion motif for women and men in a true Christian worship is a genuine concern across the Brethren circles. No wonder Wright (2006:427) observes that Gen.1:27 implies “that there is something about the wholeness of human gender complementarity and the mutual relationship it enables that reflects something true about the very nature of God. Not that God himself is sexually differentiated, but that relationship is part of the being of God and therefore also part of the very being of humanity, created in his image”. Indeed, this concept speaks to the gender complementarity model, and appears to challenge Brethren interpretation of 1 Cor. 11:13-15, which seems to pressurize women’s hair style more than men.

Certainly, though the text has been interpreted to mean the issue of the covering of hair is for the married women, Brethren have generalized it to reflect all women. This is, irrespective of the fact that, the text challenges both men and women to observe social decorum without which one might be termed a prostitute. Thus, Egnell (2010:186) arguing for the community of equals, concludes that there is a need for “an equal, receiver-oriented” relationship in church worship. Putting this in context, men and women should be expected to dress in a way that differentiates their gender. If this decorum is to be followed, then a model of a new woman/man is necessary.

Besides, contending for a community of difference Egnell (2010:188) recalls the differentiation of the Christian community in Corinth. While admitting the health side of this distinction, Egnell (2010:188) asserts that hybrid identities - the informing identifying lifestyles - may help Christians to appreciate interreligious multiplicities. Moreover, Wright (2006:107) sees this theme of identity (Jesus shares the identity of Yahweh), expressed in Κυριος Ιησους, (Jesus is Lord), which became a Christological formula for Christian identity, requires no explanation, because it is a universal truth. Moreover, argues Wright (2006:108), this two-word phrase was familiar with Greek-speaking Jews in the first century CE.

Thus, this differentiation concept in a worshipping community, where individual identities are recognized on the basis of confession of the Lordship of Christ, puts gender complementarity in its right perspective.

4.3.4 Historical development of interpretation of Daniel 1:8-16

4.3.4.1 Historical setting

The claim by the early Christian interpreters that the book of Daniel is the work of a single author born during the era of Jeremiah and living in exile in Babylon has been challenged by Porphyry, a 3rd-century pagan philosopher (McCollough, 2008:151). This challenge has been noted by McCollough (2008:151) as a call for Christian commentators to make clear that the book of Daniel was written during the Babylonian exile. Indeed, Christian writers have defended Daniel’s authorship asserting that Daniel was endowed with wisdom (Dan. 1:3-5; 2:48-49) and was loved by God (Dan. 9:23).

Thus, McCollough (2008:152) argue that the Babylonian Talmud and Theodoret of Cyr’s Commentary on Daniel criticize the Jewish viewpoint to move the book of Daniel from the prophets into the writings. Furthermore, it is clear that Jeremiah’s prophetic ministry began in 626 BCE and ended sometime after 586 BCE96 and this appears to vindicate the earlier interpreters against porphyry. However, as Collins claims (1993:25) the challenge of authenticity came to the fore again through Uriel da Costa in the 17th century, Antony Collins (the English Deist) in the 18th century and Bertholdt and Von Lenerke’s commentary in the 19th century. Collins (1993:26) further argues that, though there was a consensus in favour of Maccabean dating by the turn of the 19th century, the conservative defense of Daniel’s authorship persists to date. This conservative view seems most plausible to the researcher because matters of faith and unbelief will always pull in different directions. It is, therefore, reasonable to conclude that Daniel is not only the author of the Book of Daniel but also a prophet of God.

Having established the authorship, it is noteworthy to say that the book of Daniel is divided into two sections, chapters 1-6 and 7-12. While the former depicts Daniel’s narratives of faith in

96 ttps://www.biblica.com/bible/online-bible/scholar-notes/niv-study-bible/intro-to-jeremiah/
Yahweh, the latter conveys Daniel’s visions (Longman, 1999:19). This is what Smith (1897:23) refers to as historical and prophetical portions.

The historical setting of chapter 1 places Daniel's ministry, in the “third year of the reign of Jehoiakim” (v.1) and marks its end in “the first year of King Darius” (v.21), which is precisely, 605-539 BCE (Longman, 1999:19, 42). Indeed, the chronology of this epoch is well documented. For instance, Miller (1994:43-44)) states that Daniel was most likely born in 620 BCE during the reign of Josiah (640-609 BCE) whose first son, Jehoiakim took over the reign (609-597 BCE) after Jehoahaz, his younger brother’s (2 Kings 23:30-34) three-month rule. But it was during the three months reign of Jehoiakim's son, Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24:6-16) in 597 BCE, that Jerusalem was again invaded by Nebuchadnezzar. During this raid, observes Miller (1994:43) and Farrar (1895:124) Jehoiachin and ten thousand people of Judah were taken captive to Babylon (2 Kings 24:12-16). Besides, Smith (1897:24) notes that they either carried or damaged the holy vessels.

Miller (1994:43) indicates that Zedekiah, another son of Josiah (2 Kings 24:17-25:21), was the last king of Judah (597-586 BCE). Like his predecessor, Zedekiah defied the king of Babylon and Jerusalem was eventually seized in 586 BCE. Furthermore, Farrar (1895:124) claims that Zedekiah was killed and eight hundred and thirty-two people were taken to Babylon (Jer.29:2; Kings 25:11). So, argues Miller (1994:44) Daniel’s life cut across the reigns of the five kings of Judah that saw the collapse of Judah and the ruin of Jerusalem.

4.3.4.2 Immediate Context

This historical background puts Daniel chapter 1 into its proper perspective. It introduces narration of the four young men aged 12-14 years who were among the captives (Farrar, 1895:126). They were selected for they were full of splendour and acumen to be trained as pages in the service of King Nebuchadnezzar for three years. This argument is supported by Lucas (2002:45) and further notes that their names Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah were changed to Belteshazzar, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, respectively. The names that exalt Yahweh97, contends Lucas (2002:53), were substituted with designations that most likely implore Babylonian’s God. So, Farrar (1895:126) observes that the four youths were put under the care of Ashpenaz, master of the eunuchs98 and were provided with food and wine from the king’s table.

97 Daniel (God is my judge), Hananiah (Yahweh has been gracious), Mishael (who is what God is?) and Azariah (Yahweh has helped) (Lucas, 2002:53). See also Montgomery (1927:128-130).
98 It is likely the boys were made eunuchs (Isaiah 39:6, 7).
4.3.4.3 Ancient Interpreters

Theodoret of Cyr (in Stevenson & Glerup [eds.], 2008:158-159) notes that Daniel and his friends were well aware of the omnipresence of God so they continued to worship him even in the difficult circumstances (in exile). Thus, Theodoret of Cyr (in Stevenson & Glerup [eds.], 2008:159) observes that they vowed not to eat the king’s food because they saw “Babylonians offer defiled meat to the idols and the polluted libations at the temple.” Also, Jerome (in Stevenson & Glerup [eds.], 2008:159) states that Daniel gained favour in the eyes of the Lord. Subsequently, the prince of the eunuchs somewhat aided him to execute a plan to desist from eating defiled food from the king’s table. To this regard, Tertullian (in Stevenson & Glerup [eds.], 2008:159) conceptualized partial fasting informed by Daniel and his friends’ preference for vegetables and water instead of royal delicacies. It appears the test was successful because they ended up not only more handsome but more spiritually refined. Furthermore, Daniel was endowed with much wisdom. Truly, God gifted the four young men with much knowledge and understanding.

4.3.4.4 Reformation Interpreters

The saying that to the pure all things are pure, (v.8) looks like an affront by Calvin (1561:97) to Daniel and his companions, whom he accused of moroseness. Indeed, Calvin (1561:97) wonders why Daniel should temporarily reject the king’s luxuries only to resume later (10:3). Calvin (1561:98-99) argues that first reason that led Daniel to reject pompous lifestyle is to mourn his motherland. Secondly, to escape the possible danger of allures and temptations associated with the royal diet (snares of the devil), that could not only compromise his piety and worship of God but also endanger his health. Thus, argues Calvin (1561:99), it is the consequences of partaking the king’s delicacy that makes it abominable to Daniel, the diet is not polluted in itself.

Calvin (1561:100-101) interprets the chief eunuch’s favour (v.9) ascribed to Daniel, for terming the royal food polluted, from the viewpoint of not reporting him to the king. Daniel attributes this favour from a pagan official (Prefect) to God’s mercy in retrospect to previous contemptuous treatment of Jews by their conquerors. Thus, Calvin (1561:102) observes that God can make “most cruel, become humane when the Lord wishes to spare us”. Calvin (1561:103) sees the warm and courteous denial (v.10) of Daniel’s request as another favour of not jeopardizing their lives. Calvin (1561:105) again reckons God’s providence (v.11) to enable Daniel to bend the servant’s (in charge of Daniel) mind towards his request.

Calvin (1561:106) (vv.12-13) recollects that it wasn’t pollution that made Daniel and his friends reject the royal food, since Hebrew Scripture (Num. 6:2) allows drinking of wine, except the Nazarites. By this, Calvin (1561:106) means they could eat any food at the king’s table. Thus, the only reason for Daniel to reject the royal food is to avoid adapting “himself to the delicacies of the palace, which would cause him to become degenerate.” Hence, Calvin thought that pulse would help Daniel lament for his country, as opposed to tumbling into the king’s diet.

Following ten days of testing, Daniel and his friends came out shining. Regarding this phenomenon, Calvin (1561:107) (vs. 14-15) claims their simple lifestyle was nourished by God’s gracious providence for they were not lured by the taste, but remained steadfast in their duty to obey and fear God.

But, Calvin (1561:108) claims “it would be very frivolous to subsist entirely on pulse and water; as greater intemperance [self-indulgence], sometimes displays itself in pulse than in the best and most dainty dishes. Furthermore, Calvin (1561:109) observes, “For if anyone asks the medical profession, whether pulse and other leguminous plants are wholesome, they will tell you they are very injurious [harmful], since they know them to be so.” The point Calvin is making is that God is behind the positive outcome of the test and not the choice of the diet.

4.3.4.5 Modern Interpreters

4.3.4.5.1 The youths reject the king’s diet (v.8)

Farrah (1895:126,133) describes the food at the king’s table as meat, game, fish, joints and wheaten bread, which the four young men rejects, as they perceive it is polluted. Hence, they chose to live on pulse and water. Certainly, the phrase, to defile (גָּאַל), argues Collins (1993:142) has to do mostly with issues of blood (Isaiah 59:3), contaminated offerings (Mal. 1:7, 12) and matters of exclusion to the priesthood (Ezra 2:62). The royal diet as described here is not forbidden by the Levitical laws. Certainly argues Collins (1993:142) “interpreters since Josephus have thought that the request for a vegetarian diet implied that the rejected foods included meat. Even if the food in question was not specifically defined as unclean in the Torah, the vegetarian diet requested can be understood as an attempt to safeguard the observance of the Levitical laws”.

So, these Hebrew youths, observes Miller (1994:66), were confronted with the dilemma of remaining true to the teachings of Mosaic Law (1 Macc. 1: 62-63) without suffering from moral and ceremonial defilement. Indeed, argues Collins (1993:143), Israelites would rather die than eat polluted food. Truly, Hos. 9:3-4 implies the food in exile is defiled. Thus, Jub 22:16 elucidates this phenomenon, “keep yourself separate from the nations, and do not eat with them; do not imitate their works nor associate with them, for their works are unclean and all their ways polluted” (Collins, 1993:143).
Certainly, Daniel’s decision to stand firm borders on holiness, a fact supported by many interpreters. Collins (1993:142), Miller (1994:66) and Goldingay (1987:18-19) argue that many of the dietary provisions at the king’s court were presumed unclean since the laws of clean and unclean were not observed (Lev. 11; and Deut. 14). Again, a portion of the provision (meat and wine) would typically be offered to Babylonian gods before finding their way to the king’s table, while in Israel it would have been offered to Yahweh (Exodus 34:15; and 1 Cor. 8-10). Smith (1897:29) concurs and adds that the Babylonians used wine as a libation.

Furthermore, Goldingay (1987:19) claims that abstaining from meat and wine, while in exile, is consonant with mourning and penitence in memory of Judah, a statement affirmed by Calvin, (1561:98). Also, Goldingay (1987:19) asserts that entertaining the king’s delicacies is tantamount to reliance on him. A similar observation is made by Collins (1993:142) who agrees with Calvin (1561:97-98) that Daniel was running away from being interfered with and from affluence lifestyle.

Indeed, Lucas (2002:54) argues the manner of an offer to gods could also have applied to a vegetarian diet. Indeed, Daniel’s rejection of the king’s diet comes against a framework whereby only the king or high placed officials had the privilege of their food and drinks, specially offered to the deity for a blessing. But, Lucas (2002:54) observes the fact that since Mosaic laws do not exclude wine (except in a vow, Num. 6:2-4), then Daniel had another reason for his abstinence. Indeed, it is assumed the partakers of king’s food are likely to have an unwavering allegiance to him (11:25b-26a). Furthermore, the importance of meals in the Ancient Near East with regard to covenant-making, for example, Exodus 24:1-11 could have influenced Daniel’s decision. So what Daniel is rejecting is total control by the king, but then argues Lucas (2002:54), the term defile isn’t explicable.

Daniel and his friends subsequently stood before the king as courtiers’ and the nature of this role itself seems to the researcher to constitute defilement. Moreover, Collins (1993:143) alludes to the fact that Daniel later ate meat and drank wine, though not from the king’s table (10:3). But as Lucas (2002:54-55) observes, the term defile (גָּאַל, ga.al) in other contexts refers to cultic defilement, for instance, as used in Ezra 2:62 and Neh.7:64, which in the case of Daniel goes further to give his allegiance to Yahweh. Furthermore, Nebuchadnezzar’s plunder of the Jerusalem temple constitutes defilement and a reasonable factor to reject anything that could jeopardize his loyalty to God.

No doubt then, Gaebelein (1911:13) portrays Daniel as a faithful servant of God of Israel in Babylon. Even though only 14 years old, he seems to have understood the law of God that he should not defile himself with what he considers to be unclean. Furthermore, Montgomery (1927:130) argues that the refraining from meat sacrificed with the blood (Acts 15:20) and wine graced with religious libations (1 Cor. 10:21) was pious Jews’ religious practice to escape defilement. For instance, Judas and his company (2 Mac. 5:27) isolated themselves from pollution to eat grass in the mountains. Nevertheless, Miller (1994:67), reckons that defilement of wine is not in Jewish law and its profane nature here would be associated with religious libations. Thus, Daniel’s dilemma was based on his religious convictions that he should remain faithful to Yahweh.

However, contends Collins (1993:143), not all Jews in the diaspora had a problem with food. For instance, Jehoiachin (2 Kings 25:29-30) and Nehemiah (as a cup bearer) must have eaten from the king’s table. So the issue of Daniel and his friends must have been occasioned by a need to limit assimilation into the Gentile culture. Thus, they resolved not to pollute or defile (גָּאַל) themselves with the royal delicacies. Miller (1994:67) and Calvin (1561:99) observe that Daniel did not refuse the kingly diet because it had covenant significance, but also agrees with Goldingay (1987:19) that Daniel saw the king’s delicacies as a snare towards abiding by the king’s policies. Besides, Smith (1987:29) claims that his abstinence was occasioned by his infirmity, a fact earlier observed by Calvin (1561:98). Nevertheless, this food was unclean by Jewish standards and Daniel decided not to defile himself.

4.3.4.5.2 God’s favour endangers the Eunuch’s life (vv. 9-10)

It looks obvious from the way the king appointed the diet for Daniel and his friends that he was interested in their welfare. No doubt, argues Smith (1897:30), the Eunuch was reluctant to grant the young men’s request as it could lead to his execution. Moreover, he had specific instructions from the king, failure to do such endangered his head (רֹאשׁ אֶת־חוּב) with the king. Thus, Miller (1994:68) portrays Ashpenaz/Eunuch’s response (1:9-10) as God’s favour (לְחֶסֶד) and sympathy (וּֽלְרַחֲמִים) as he worked through the pagan official to grant Daniel’s request.

Montgomery (1927:131) does not think רֹאשׁ אֶת־חוּב carries the death penalty but understands it to mean the chief official is solely answerable or responsible for the welfare of the youths. But, Goldingay (1987:19-20) views the phrase, endanger my head, like the death penalty. It seems his fear is not imaginary but well-founded (2:12; 3:19-20) if the boys were to end up unhealthy. Therefore, he would not wish to provoke the king to anger and is understandably sad. However, as Smith (1897:30) observes, the fact that Nebuchadnezzar wanted the very best mental and physical growth for these young men shows a praiseworthy kingly picture.

Daniel and his friends appear to be aware of the pressure they were exerting on the chief official (Ashpenaz), and on themselves as well. Certainly, as Goldingay (1987:19) notes, they could have been accused not only of insubordination to Nebuchadnezzar’s orders but also of causing disharmony amidst other captives who had no problem with the diet.
So, Montgomery (1927:31) observes that the Eunuch’s compassionate answer was divinely inspired so that after ten days of water and vegetables, they came out stronger and more beautiful. Collins (1993:143) agrees with Montgomery and reckons this favourable attitude to the Jews by Gentile leaders is consistent in chapters 1-6. An observation made by Montgomery (1927:131) concerning favours to other Jews like Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah.

Thus, Lucas (2002:55) notes that the chief official’s reply is not an outright refusal but raises a problem that leaves Daniel’s request deprecated (Montgomery, 1927:131) with the possibility of evading the problem. But, argues Lucas (2002:55), a proposal by Daniel for a test period on a vegetarian diet to a junior officer was successful.

4.3.4.5.3 Testing for ten days (vv. 11-16)

Farrar (1895:134) observes that they were allowed to experiment for ten days on water and pulse\footnote{Pulse is a vegetable food of the leguminous kind like peas, beans, etc., plants that are either pulled or plucked, but not reaped (Smith, 1895:30). In addition, Miller (1994:69) points out that the term refers to “that which grows from sown seed” and “include not only vegetables but fruits, grains, and bread that is made from grains”.
} or vegetables (הַזֵּרֹעִים). Smith (1897:30) agrees with Farrar but acknowledges an overwhelming presence of God’s favour in their request. However, this request does not insinuate eating meat is wrong because as Miller (1994:69) points out, the Passover meal constitutes a meat diet. Indeed, Lucas (2002:55) observes that Daniel later returned to his regular diet of meat and wine (10:3). This shows the issue was not a vegetarian diet, but as mentioned earlier, the implication of partaking the royal food at this point. As Graebelin, (1911:14) notes, this reason would justify Daniel’s petition to the Chief Eunuch to be excused from defiling himself with the heathen food.

Indeed, after the test, Farrar (1895:134), Smith (1997:30) and Miller (1994:69) assert that the young men appeared healthier and better nourished than the other youths who dined from the king’s table. Therefore, they were permitted to continue with a diet of vegetables and water for their entire time of training. Thus, Smith (1897:30) states that pulse and water, for only ten days, cannot account for this improvement, unless by God’s extraordinary intervention.

Conversely, Collins (1993:142) notes Josephus’ argument that the young men’s fresh look is not a result of simple lifestyle, but because “they did not oppress and weigh down their souls with a variety of food”. Nevertheless, going by the description in the footnote, the writer believes pulse is a health food. This claim is supported by Miller’s (1994:70) contention that nutritional experts advise fruits and vegetables for best health. But, Calvin (1561:109), writing in the 16th century, says medically they are injurious. Nonetheless, healthy environment and divine intervention can take precedence over Miller and Calvin’s allegations.
Furthermore observes Farrar (1895:134) and Gaebelein (1911:14), they were endowed with knowledge and wisdom. Indeed, Daniel’s respect among the Chaldeans grew due to his understanding of dreams and visions. After three years of training, Farrar (1895:135) notes that the four were found superior and worthy to become personal assistants to the king.

That notwithstanding, Collins (1993:143) doubts the claim that their refusal of the king’s food is attributed to asceticism or fasting. However, going by Calvin’s (1561:98) assertion that Daniel’s rejection of the king’s diet was to perpetually remember his country, and Goldingay’s (1987:19) observation, that abstaining from a festival diet constitutes mourning or penitence, then fasting cannot be overruled.

4.3.4.6 Appraisal of Daniel 1:8-16 by Brethren

4.3.4.6.1 Refusal of “Tea” at Gatundu (Defiled diet)

As observed earlier, most of Brethren have been interpreting biblical texts almost literally and Daniel 1:8-16 is not an exception. In 1969, the phrases, Daniel resolved not to defile himself, (v.8) and, let us be given vegetables to eat and water to drink, (v. 12), were the rallying call for the disgruntled members of EARM (Brethren) in Kenya. This date is confirmed by some respondents from Kirinyaga who understood the text meant leaving EARM to form another group. The idea of leaving was orchestrated by demand directed at members of the Kikuyu community to take the tribal oath, called “tea,” meant to pay allegiance to Jomo Kenyatta presidency following the assassination of Tom Mboya in Nairobi. The ordeal is described by Gitari (2014:185) as the most humiliating experience:

“They were made to squat and ordered around by unruly youths and given the most unpalatable concoction to drink. Those who resisted were beaten up and some were killed. This brought President Kenyatta into his first major conflict with the church. Many members of East African Revival Movement had refused to take the Mau Mau oath because they could not mix the blood of Jesus that had washed their sins away with that of goats. Many revivalists had been killed for refusing to take the Mau Mau oath and were willing to die rather than drink the “tea” at Gatundu with the president.”

Certainly, this is a pagan ceremony, in all its trappings, that could not have been accepted by many members of EARM. Indeed, as hinted by Gitari above, serious oathing preceded the one of 1969. Baur (1994:480) observes that during Mau Mau rebellion against the white regime in Kenya, some Christians succumbed to pressure and participated in the pagan oathing rituals. However, many members of EARM died as martyrs. This boldness in the face of persecution provided the necessary impetus to reject the diet of a goat at Jomo Kenyatta’s home in Gatundu.
Therefore, like Daniel and his friends, the demand by EARM was to be excused from defiling themselves. Indeed, the situation that EARM found itself in is similar to what the early Church interpreter, Theodoret of Cyr (in Stevenson & Glerup [eds.], 2008:159), and indeed, most of the modern commentators, like Collins (1993:142), Miller (1994:66) and Goldingay (1987:18-19) perceived of Daniel. That is, like Daniel and his friends, EARM refused Kenyatta’s food because it was perceived polluted.

Indeed, taking “tea” at Gatundu with the president would have signaled subjection of their faith to Kenyatta. This could have compromised their faith in God. Similarly, commentators like Calvin (1561:98) and Collins (1993:143) show Daniel's piety and worship of God as enough reason to refuse the king’s diet. Thus, the fact that Brethren sought to abstain from what appears profane signifies a missiological model towards the sanctity of the Christian faith in Christ.

4.3.4.6.2 Mtama na maji (pulse and water)

The oathing context, most likely made some members of EARM choose to separate themselves from those of their members perceived to have participated. This led to the birth of Mtama na Maji (sorghum and water) which also came to be referred to as Kupaa, which means to rise up/to separate/to leave EARM. This split was actualized in 1969, a date consistent with some leaders of EARM who participated in this research.

Thus, like Daniel, Kupaa group was opposed to the eating of contaminated food at the king’s/president’s table and took the symbolical slogan – only sorghum¹⁰⁰ (pulse) and water. Though Kupaa group did not necessarily drink water and eat sorghum, they were only sending a strong message of their call to the salvation of God. Like Daniel (Calvin, 1561:99) they had no problem with meat, per se, but with the pagan oath.

So, Kupaa faction has had long-standing impacts on social lifestyle. Undeniably, some respondents from Mount Kenya Central claimed that Kupaa stopped its adherents from attending social gatherings where delicacies were served. This is complemented by a respondent from Embu who contends that Kupaa group was against worldly influence (Lucas (2002:54). Indeed, Figgs (1907:101) observes that the attitude of Christians living in affluence and yet were giving little gifts to the mission field were frequent reports in Keswick meetings. This inconsistency in giving to the work of God, particularly by Brethren Fellowships has remained a hindrance to the church mission. Truly, most members of Kupaa and indeed, generally most members of EARM/Brethren are inherently poor. Furthermore, many appear not be interested in church missions except in their self-initiated conventions. Additionally, Mambo ¹⁰⁰ Sorghum is a common plant in Kenya and so is easy to apply directly to the text.

(1973:115) suggests that they seem to give money to their project through what is called Mtuko wa Bwana (The Lord's Bag). This has somewhat led many of them so avoid socio-economic programmes.

Indeed, a focus group discussion in Kirinyaga attributed this problem of social gatherings to some traditional rituals that precede slaughter of a designated animal in some occasions. The argument has been that some traditional spirits are invoked, rendering the meat unclean to the Brethren. However, this wholesale condemnation of social events today may not be justified, because not all ceremonies may invoke traditional rituals. Again, not all traditional rites amount to pollution.

Yet they have developed strict morality. On the one hand, they oppose weddings of pregnant girls and renewal of marriages. On the other hand, they emphasize simple weddings devoid of luxuries, where even cutting of the cake is not done. The lifestyle still borders on water and vegetables. This self-denial could be linked to fasting/mourning, most likely for other Christians, who to them are languishing in extravagant lifestyles and pride (Calvin, 1561:98); Goldingay (1987:19). However, Pollock (1964:67) states that Keswick taught against reverting to old temptations of pride, so it might serve right for Kupaa, to descend to the level of other Christians to inform and be informed.

Evidently, this group of Brethren might have misunderstood the scripture, taking it out of context and applying it to themselves. As said before, Keswick devotional reading of the Bible could be attributed to almost a century-long style, propagated through leaders of revival. Indeed, the days at Keswick convention were spent entirely on the exposition of some key biblical topics dealing with holiness and sanctification (Reed, 2007:21). However, the Keswick teachers, as noted before, were mostly theologically unschooled. Little has changed today among the Brethren Fellowship leaders. Indeed, the fact that most theologians/clergy seem unwelcome in the Revival Fellowship means the status quo remains.

This creates a distance, not only between Kupaa and EARM but also with other Christians and the surrounding community. Nonetheless, some respondents in Mount Kenya Central argues that later the Kupaa faction developed into the people of light or Fellowship of the light (Matt. 5:14). Thus, the offshoot of the Brethren Revival Fellowship, which believes in walking in the light, is Kupaa. They exchange greetings, praise the Lord, a hallmark of not only Brethren but of most evangelical Anglicans today.

4.3.4.7 Missiological perspectives on Brethren's interpretation of Daniel 1:8-16

Interpretation of this text by Kupaa (rising up) faction appears to have strengthened their resolve to protect their faith in God against defilement. However, if Kupaa’s simplicity is Christ-centred, then their participation in the mission of Christ would have seen the growth of the faction and the Brethren as a whole. But as Iversen (2010:193) observes, Christ in us (Col.1:27) is an essential concept to missional ecclesiology. This makes sense for beliefs and practice of walking in light because if Christ is in us, then our body is Christ's. That means Christ's body (the church) is not exclusive but welcomes all; the tax collectors and the immoral people.

Indeed, Livingston (2013:292) depicts the church as God's alternative community in which it “exists simultaneously as a theological entity and a sociological entity,” a concept supported by Iversen (2010:193). Thus, argues Livingston (2013:292) the church should be genuinely a missionary community, which recognizes its dual nature in the matters of God and the matters of the world, i.e., being in the world, but not of the world. However, Henriksen (2010:70) claims that the church exists because there is the world, which is God's, but in a state that somewhat contravenes dictums of its creator. So, this dual nature has been problematic, on the one hand, more aspects of the world have entered the church and, on the other hand, the church appears to have less impact in the world. In order to make maximum use of this tension, a preferred future model is necessary.

Following this, Kupaa, like any other member of EARM bases his faith in Christ, and should depict a Christocentric community of forgiveness and reconciliation (Hastings: 2012:128). Moreover, Hastings (2012:129) states that since the nature of the church is one with the missional Christ, it ought to be attractive and incarnational to the poor and the rich. Surely, Brethren Fellowship is prone to exclusiveness and poses a missional challenge. Certainly, an exclusion motif against the affluence forced Kupaa to confine itself to a simple lifestyle. This simple way of life, raises a mission concern, because the affluent and other outsiders should hear the gospel preached to them. Furthermore, Livingston (2013:227) claims evangelism is the centre of the mission, calling all people to join Christ's earthly community. So, while simplicity is a virtue, Kupaa ought to welcome others into the community.

But, Wright (2006:380-81) observes that exclusiveness of Israel's worship (Deut. 4:9-31) is a model for the nation's exclusive faithfulness to Yahweh, without which they would lose their distinctiveness. Unlike Israelites, Kupaa's “Christocentric” distinctiveness is a superficial reflection of self-righteousness – a holier-than-thou attitude.

4.4 ANGLICAN EVANGELICAL TRADITION FRAMEWORK FOR WALKING IN THE LIGHT

In order to hinge the missiological foundations needed to critique particular tenets of the current trend in EARM (in chapter 5), this section will explicate the Anglican Evangelical tradition. Firstly, in order to culminate in a new EARM’s model of the theology of sanctification, Anglican Evangelical tradition will inform the researcher’s theoretical framework to analyze scriptural teachings related to sanctification and holiness. Since these Scriptural teachings have already been captured earlier in this chapter, contextually elucidated, interpreted and applied to the prevailing beliefs and practices of walking in the light, a debunking of each will now be placed within the context of the Anglican Evangelical tradition. They will be classified into three themes: exclusion (Ephesians 5:14 and Daniel 1:8-15), standing firm (1 Cor. 11:13-15) and social convention (Ephesians 6:13).

Although standing firm and social convention are to larger extent exclusive, for the sake of a comprehensive approach to demystifying Brethren Scriptural teachings from the perspective of the Anglican Evangelical tradition, they will be analyzed as distinct themes. However, in the formulation of the current theological model of walking in the light, they will be subsumed in the exclusion concept.

Secondly, this section will root out the beliefs and practices of walking in the light in the Anglican evangelical tradition, a faithful participant in the missio Dei.

It is not within the scope of this study to discuss where Anglican Evangelicals are going or what they are taking along (Packer, 1978:13). It suffices to say that Anglican and Evangelical traditions do not view themselves as one distinct monolithic structure but a variety of theological and spiritual influences (Turnbull, 2007:49). Also, Anglican evangelicals faithfully honour their mother traditions though not without theological and practical tensions (Turnbull, 2007:93).

Having said that, it is critical to point out that the concern of this study is to have the Anglican Evangelical tradition framework as a benchmark to analyze Brethren's lifestyle. Three key Anglican Evangelical fundamentals anchor this analysis, namely; supremacy of Scripture, Doctrine of Reformed ecclesiology and engaging the Prayer Book. Each of these fundamentals hinges themes of exclusion, standing firm and social convention.

4.4.1 Supremacy of Scripture

Packer (1978:20) hold the view that the Holy Scripture is θεόπνευστος (theopneustos), that is, God-breathed or inspired by God, and thus a sufficient guide for instruction in all matters of faith and practice (2Tim 3:16). Indeed, it is useful for correction and renewal of spiritual life for both individual believers and the churches (Packer, 1978:20). Therefore, Scripture ought to hinge and interweave the seeming cracks that pervade Anglican and Evangelical relationships. Certainly, Turnbull (2007:104) claims Anglicans and Evangelicals share basics beliefs concerning the Bible as the highest authority in matters of faith and practice. Moreover, Gills (2006:238) notes that formularies of the Anglican Church were both biblical and evangelical and this appears to vindicate evangelicals' loyalty to Anglicanism. Besides, this claim of scriptural supremacy is justified in Anglicans and Evangelicals traditions of origin, canonical and liturgical expressions and in religious observance, which upholds the Thirty-Nine Articles, the Lambeth Quadrilateral\textsuperscript{101}, the Canons and the Declaration of Assent (Turnbull, 2007:104). Furthermore, the issuing of the Bible in the ordination rites demonstrates its authority in the ministry and mission of the church, which is steadfast with Evangelical belief (Turnbull, 2007:105). Besides, Packer (1978:22-23) suggests that evangelical Christianity, inside and outside Anglicanism has a high view of the ordained ministry as a personal calling, though the church is regarded highly as a shared priesthood where accessibility to God and service is equal.

Nonetheless, tension abounds within the traditions, particularly when some Anglicans quote other authorities (reason and tradition) other than the scripture (Turnbull, 2007:106). This is consistent with Wright’s (1980:25) description of Evangelicals’ insistence of the primacy of the Bible and not the church, a perspective that has been pushed forward to depict the Scripture and the church as exclusive alternatives. Thus, Wright (1980:11) points out the interpretation of Scripture as divisive particularly with respect to some doctrinal and ethical debates like homosexuality and women ordination. So, Atherstone (2008:68) suggests that an apparent Anglican Evangelical identity crisis brings to the fore significant ecclesial and theological questions about what it means to be authentically evangelical in the wider Church of England. This polarization tends to keep the parties looking over their shoulders concerning the alternatives. Following this, a treatment of scriptural themes of sanctification and holiness ought to be considered from the perspective of the Anglican Evangelical tradition.

4.4.1.1 Exclusion

The authority of Scripture is fully observed by Brethren, though they have been accused of literal interpretation and devotional reading (Reed, 2007:58). This might differ from Anglican evangelical which has been championed by towering theological figures like J.I Packer and John Stott. Perhaps Brethren need to borrow a leaf and entertain more clergy in their fellowship but without losing their spiritual fervour. Certainly, the Bible is central in their life, a tradition that reaches as far back as early Keswick conventions where themes on various holiness passages were expounded (Ward, 2012:3). This is reflected in the writings of the pioneer members of EARM like Dr. Joe Church and Simeon Nsibambi among others who fervently devoured the Bible resulting in the famous clarion call, Every Man a Bible Student (Church, 1981:62). With guidance, this is the way to go. Indeed as Gills (2006:233) observes the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES) required proper guidelines on the handling of scripture, but unfortunately, overemphasis on evangelicalism had led them astray.

\textsuperscript{101} The Holy Scriptures, as containing all things necessary to salvation. 2. The Apostles’ Creed as the Baptismal Symbol; and the Nicene Creed as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith. 3. The two Sacraments ordained by Christ himself - Baptism and the Supper of the Lord. 4. The historic episcopate, locally adapted (Schaff, 2004-2016 [online]).
Indeed, entertainment of more of godly worldliness should be considered which calls to living in a creative tension, where good from either divide is shared. Indeed, Anglican evangelicals have endured tension, more so after the 1966 debacle, but as Gills (2006:233) observes it has not been without consequences, only time will tell the exact impact of the conflict. Meanwhile, the Anglican Evangelical identity has to some extent been elusive and this raises the question of the actual beneficiaries of this crisis. Is it the Church of England or evangelical churches? Even though this question is beyond the scope of this study one would not fail to perceive the pressure of a church on edge its distinguished biblical and theological scholarship. The extent to which the church opens its doors to challenge its traditional basis in the Scripture will shape the course of the Church of England of the future. So when a prominent stakeholder participant in this research states that few African bishops led by the American and English counterparts have made claims against LGBT\footnote{Stands for lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender.} basing their reasons on the Bible and culture, one may not fail to notice obvious tensions that accompany the Scriptural authority.

However, serious consideration of the primacy of Scripture without informed exegesis is not laudable either. Certainly, the majority of the Kenyan wing of EARM, fondly referred to as Brethren are illiterate, yet faithful believers, who unquestionably apply their literal understanding of the Bible to daily life. Thus, Biblically reinforced dissensions had been the natural consequence over the years, which influences beliefs and practices of walking in the light, with the power to set norms of inclusion and exclusion from the Fellowship. There is no easy way for such a community other than living on the edge looking over the shoulders on the ones excluded while marking the boundaries for the included. Surely, a theology of inclusion ought to be the model for the future.

4.4.1.2 Standing firm

Brethren’s view of the primacy of the Holy Scripture cannot be overemphasized. It is so central that majority of the splits were occasioned by their mostly flawed interpretation of the Bible. Brethren appear to firmly accept the words of Paul to Timothy (2Tim 3:16) unquestioningly the Bible is inspired by God and thus suitable for instruction in righteousness. With this regard, some of them preach even to passengers inside the public vehicles. Surely, Brethren like Anglicans and Evangelicals shares fundamental beliefs concerning the Bible as the highest authority (Turnbull 2007:104) albeit exegetical challenges. Nonetheless, the Bible should be a focal point of Brethren’s Unity and not a source of division. Indeed, Brethren theology, like Keswick teachings has been anchored firmly on the Scripture as the word of God. For instance, Keswick meetings were referred to as conventions for the promotion of scriptural holiness propagated through various Keswick Bible conferences and conventions (Barabas, 1952:30). It appears that, in some ways, Evangelicals too were influenced by Keswick, or at least shares antecedents of the Holiness Movement, which as intimated earlier was Keswick’s precursor, which as Turnbull (2007:79) observes emphasized exclusion from corrupting influences. This appears consistent with Brethren’s advocacy for strict ethical theology informed by what looks like holiness tradition.

Thus, Wright’s (1980:25) view of Evangelicals resolve to elevate the Bible and not the church, seems plausible. Indeed, Brethren do not look up to the church so much as a guide to their faith and practice. What appears to matter is Scriptural exposition whether devotionally or not. Certainly, Brethren view the Anglican Church of Kenya’s spirituality as lukewarm for what they perceive as insensitiveness to Scriptural authority. Thus, some ordinary members of Brethren who participated in this research questioned theological education at St Andrew’s College, Kabare for graduating students who appear more immoral than when they joined the college. This compares with Packer and Wright’s (2008:53) observation of Church of England clergy and laity of the 1930s and 1940s’ contempt for biblical and theological studies. This has changed for the Church of England where theological scholarship has grown but not without divisive Anglican/Evangelical viewpoints as seen in the 1967 Keele conference. The eventual standoff between Stott and Jones is reminiscent of the stand firm theme, where Stand Brethren stood firm against contending and somewhat marauding forces ranging from the Arise demand for the awakening of the ‘sleepeth’ to the firm refusal of oathing at Gatundu (Gitari, 2014:185).

4.4.1.3 Social Convention

One of the strengths of Anglican Evangelical Identity is the mutual sharing of the primacy of Bible as the core fundamental concerning faith and practice (Turnbull, 2007:104). On the one hand, McGrath (1993:19) associates this mutuality on the Evangelicals propensity to enjoin itself into any ecclesiology grounded in the Scripture. On the other hand, the Anglicans offer to the evangelicals a vision of the church, which is not only consistent with the New Testament but also grounded in the Christian tradition that upholds pastoral and evangelistic functions. This unique element of association sets the pace for a healthy biblical and theological engagement towards a harnessed and cohesive church organ. But as Wright (1980:11) observes the extent to which biblical authority is endorsed will most likely inform doctrinal and ethical issues. Thus, Wabukukala (2014:59) claims that the Scripture has been rendered vague by church tradition. He cites a case in the USA where one of the Episcopal Church bishops, in support of same-sex relationship, sensationaly attacked the authority of the Bible as to say; “we wrote the Bible and we can rewrite it. We have rewritten the Bible many times”. Such provocative sentiments by a revisionist bishop go against the social convention and most Anglican evangelicals would repulse it.
Certainly, early Keswick theology upheld a social decorum that abhorred sensual self-indulgence and focused on pleasing God and neighbour (Pierson, 1907:94-94). This socially-ethical expectation informed beliefs and practices of the Keswick Movement, which might have influenced the East African Revival. No wonder born again Brethren conversion demands to leave behind carnal lifestyle and henceforth embraces a new life girded with moral codes (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:202). Indeed, accepted code of hairdos is one of the highlights of numerous do’s and don’ts that pervade Brethren social life. Although the literal interpretation of the Bible informs Brethren’s social convention, it has, nonetheless, maintained a distinct spiritual identity that appears to confront Christian nominalism when some section of the church is silent. Indeed, one of the prominent stakeholders who participated in this research maintains that the place and role of LGBT in the Anglican Communion has remained divisive. This is not only a challenge to the Anglican Evangelical identity, but one of the main causes of concern in the Anglican Communion gravitated by the GAFCON agenda (Wabukala, 2014:52). Admittedly, the majority of the East African Anglican bishops, including the retired Primate of Anglican Church of Kenya (ACK) Dr. Eliud Wabukala (GAFCON 2013, online) stand against homosexuality as is informed by the EARM.

4.4.2 Reformed Doctrine Ecclesiology

The theological root of Evangelical Anglican appears to draw its inspiration from the Reformed doctrine in what Turnbull (2007:93) calls moderate Calvinism because of its appeal to the Thirty-Nine Articles, The Eclectic Society103 theological deliberations and in modern Evangelical scholarship. In addition, Turnbull (2007:93-94) contends that moderate Calvinism brings together the Reformed/Puritan traditions alongside the perceptions of the Revival with a renewed spiritual impetus, which resonates with the historic foundations of the Anglican tradition. However, observes Gills (2006:241), working in an eclectic ecclesiastical setting appears to hinder evangelical bishops’ evangelical focus. Further, Gills (2006:241) notes remarks by a lecturer at Wycliffe Hall, “We are supposed to have more evangelical bishops in the House of Bishops than ever before, and yet the Episcopal attack on evangelicalism continues unabated.”

Turnbull (2007:94) clarifies this scenario by citing John Venn, the Vicar of Clapham who summarizes the Anglican Evangelicalism’s moderate Calvinism at The Eclectic Society, “if to believe the truth of the gospel is enough, then all may be saved. If it be to believe savingly, then 103 This Society was instituted in 1783 by London Clergy who met weekly “for mutual religious intercourse and improvement and for the investigation of religious truth” (Anon, [online] 2017. Eclecticism is “any system of theology or philosophy which, rather than adhere to one school of tradition, selects such elements as seem the best in several systems, and combine them” (Cross & Livingstone, 1997:527).

the range is more limited.” In other words, as Turnbull (2007:94) puts it, the elements of exclusivity still abides in the belief of a general redemption, on the one hand, and specific redemption via the covenant of grace for the elect, on the other.

This puts the Anglican Evangelical understanding of predestination into the right perspective whereby the Calvinist stress on sin and depravity is upheld and this signifies sufficiency of the work of Christ on the cross for everyone (Turnbull, 2007:94). Thus, Turnbull (2007:95) observes and inspires a Reformed doctrinal evangelism within Anglican Evangelicalism on the one hand, and affirms a penal substitutionary view of the atonement in which sinners could be reconciled to God, on the other. Thus, a practical Calvinism achieved in doctrine, evangelism, ecclesiology and pastoral ministry illustrates crucial features of Anglican Evangelicalism (Turnbull, 2007:95) albeit theological and practical tensions.

Scholars like Stott and Lloyd-Jones, at least before the 1966 acrimonious disagreement, held a traditional evangelical ecclesiology view that depicted the Church as an invisible community yet demonstrating a real spiritual partnership transcending all traditions across denominational limits (Gills, 2006: 237). Indeed, it is noteworthy, argues McGrath (1993:13) that Evangelicalism has no central or defining ecclesiology and can co-exist within any form of church order, as well as the Roman Catholic Church.

But, Packer and Wright (2008:51) claim that Evangelicals are occasionally misunderstood to have a weak opinion of the church, although the truth is they regard the church as a community organism where fellowship is primary, and the structures are secondary. Nevertheless, they are free to adopt any ecclesiology that is founded in Scripture, Christian tradition and is pastorally based (McGrath, 1993:19). This suggests Anglicans and Evangelicals are interdependent and thus enabled to work together through the Catholic structures of the Church of England (McGrath, 1993:19-20). But then again while admitting this interdependency Gills (2006:240) cautions against damaging the very basis of the evangelical gospel.

4.4.2.1 Exclusion

The moderate Calvinism as expressed in the British Anglican evangelicalism in particular on the elect doctrine of predestination appear to resonate with Brethren’s exclusive scheming for their self-righteousness/holier-than-thou that pervades their daily sanctification. They are fond of pointing at sin, mostly of other Christians apart from themselves, as if saying they are awake while others ‘sleepeth’, or they are holy while others are wallowing in the defiling lifestyles. Indeed, during the early Keswick Conventions, the subject of the sin principle took the first two days where topics on diagnosis and the cure for sin were taught (Naselli, 2010:171). This shows the remedy for sin is critical to a believer’s spiritual life. This view of sin might resonate with Brethren’s Confession to one another, experiences of the failed walking in the light during their weekly fellowships. This appears to negate their hitherto pious disposition and suggests that, like other Christians, they are prone to sin. In other words, they too are depraved sinners in need of Christ’s forgiveness.

Indeed, their sanctimoniousness has not only regularly tended to put some of them on a collision course with clergy but have also denied themselves chances of being frontrunners in the evangelism activities of the Anglican Church of Kenya. The costs of this nature of tension appear to resonate with English Evangelicals who in spite of producing an Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey (Gills, 2006:241), remains undermined by the Church of England polity. Indeed, in spite of the acclaimed conception that majority Kenyan Anglican bishops are Brethren, might be superficial, if their attendance to the Brethren Fellowship is considered.

This view is consistent with one of the prominent stakeholders in this research who contended that Theology of Revival today is remote and it is more on what some leaders say, but it does not impact on life. One of the stakeholders admits that most of Anglican Church leaders have been influenced by it as far as the doctrine of salvation is concerned but it is not reflected in the social-ethical life.

Certainly, the lifestyle of the Anglicans ought to influence and be influenced by the society around. This is true of the Evangelical ecclesiology, which is not limited to any church order (McGrath, 1993:13). Indeed, a routine that Packer and Wright (2008:51) portray where the structures of Church of England ought to encourage interdependence.as a community church entity of mutual fellowship. Brethren stereotyping lifestyle is not limited to the Anglican Church of Kenya (ACK) and pervades majority mainstream Protestant Churches like the Methodist Church of Kenya and the Presbyterian Church of East Africa. This non-denominational community integration if well nurtured and theologically guided might hold the key for a rejuvenated, renewed and all-inclusive Brethren Fellowship.

The eclectic challenge to the Reformed tradition might have contributed to the Anglican Evangelicals what has been described as a mixed denomination in the Church of England, which implies recognition of dissenting opinions, in this case, pitting evangelicals’ and non-evangelicals in the Church of England (Gills, 2006:238). The ensuing tension might have precipitated episcopal attacks on evangelicalism that might have led to fewer evangelical bishops in the Church of England (Gills, 2006:241). This context puts the stand firm concept in its proper perspective as well perpetuated by the two leading Anglican Evangelical Journals, the Churchman, and the Anvil, which rival each other (Atherstone, 2008:3). This resonates with Keswick swipe on the church as comprised of wounded soldiers (Barabas, 1952:30) where believers were expected to attend a spiritual clinic where diagnoses and cures are administered courtesy of the Keswick Week Conveners (Naselli, 2010:171). But this standoff between the perceived sick and the purported nurse scenario culminated into the, let go and let God, procedure which is not only unbiblical but misleading as a means of sanctification (Naselli, 2010:4), and therefore, a flawed means of the Christian doctrine of sanctification.

This sort of divisiveness arising from misappropriation of the doctrine of sanctification appears to have impacted on Brethren lifestyle of daily sanctification through definite beliefs and practices, which hedge them against the present evil now and in the unpredictable future. This creates a paradox. While Brethren appear to put their trust on a panoply of God’s righteousness informed by daily sanctification as a defense against the adversaries, they nonetheless segregate themselves from other Christians. Certainly, Brethren appear to rally their defense behind rules of conduct more than reliance on God. Even though, this is a significant departure from the early Keswick, let go and let God, nevertheless, is like falling over the precipice. This trend appears to resonate with the worrying doctrinal drift in the Anglican evangelicalism following the birth of the Anvil Journal [1984], which as Atherstone (2008:4) suggests continues to conflict with the Churchman.

4.4.2.3 Social Convention

Roberts (2014:35), while quoting Ryle sentiments on the danger of a church that is unclear doctrinally, maintained that a church creed shouldn’t be excessively narrow but comprehensive. This is consistent with Turnbull’s (2007:93-94) suggestion that moderate Calvinism incorporates Reformed/Puritan traditional Spirit in the Anglican tradition, which stresses the sufficiency of the cross for all rather than on atonement only to the elect. However, unchecked comprehensiveness on doctrinal purity argues McGrath (1993:16) can have counterproductive consequences in the relation between the Anglican Evangelicals and the non-evangelical Anglicans in the Church of England. It thus seems complicated to observe a conventional tradition that suits all, instead, coexisting in creative tension might be an option.

The early Keswick slogan watchword of “All one in Christ Jesus,” sought to harmonize their comprehensive lifestyle informed by sanctification and practical holiness (Head, 1907:114). This slogan, adds Pollock (1964:62), came into use at the 1882 mega Convention which brought together over twelve hundred delegates. As seen earlier, the teachings of Keswick instilled into gatherings a theological understanding that somewhat hedged them away from other Christians. This sort of arrangement is unswerving with members of EARM. Indeed, Nsibambi, a key figure of pioneers of EARM claimed to discern whether new missionaries were born again by a shake of hands (Church 1981:87). This is consistent with Barrington-Ward’s (2012:53) challenge by a Revivalist at Selly Oak, Birmingham to declare his walk in the light. There is no doubt this explicates Brethren’s practical social convention, a rigid mindset that has continued to inform a two Christian scenarios. One is, Brethren and the other are non-Brethren (Christians considered by Brethren to have not been born again), the reason being indecorum with Brethren code of conduct. This narrow disposition has affected Brethren’s exponential growth, as they seem old-fashioned and out of touch with the Anglican Church of Kenya worship dynamism. As Packer (1978:29) observes, like Anglican evangelicals, Brethren should pursue clear goals of spreading pure Christianity that adapt and speaks to the life of both the church and the surrounding community.

4.4.3 Engaging the Prayer Book

The Prayer Book of the Anglican Evangelical claims Turnbull (2007:96) is, in essence, the second Book of Common Prayer (BCP) of 1552 formulated under Edward VI, which not only depicts the Reformed Anglican liturgy but is foundational to both the Elizabethan Settlement and the 1662 BCP. This fact sheds light on the apparent relationship between the 1552 Prayer Book and the Elizabethan Settlement of 1559 that set religious uniformity across England. Thus, by instituting the BCP and polity and thirty-nine articles of religion in 1571, Elizabeth appears to have set limits for the Church of England (McGrath, 1993:11). As McGrath (1993:12) further observes, Anglicanism in its initial phases was not steadfast “to any set of doctrines which can be designated as distinctively and exclusively Anglican,” but notes throughout history Anglicanism has embraced some theological inclusiveness.

This is supported by Chadwick (1988:105) who notes that the BCP and the English Ordinal provide the best expression of the Anglican theology of inclusion rather than of exclusion. However, Turnbull (2007:53-54) observes excessive ritualism and exclusiveness of the Episcopal Church not only inspired formation of the Reformed Episcopal Church in 1873 but also provided opportunity for the Reformed church to organize its ecclesiology based on supreme authority of Scripture, assent to the plain teaching of the 39 articles and worship centred on the BCP. However, Packer and Wright (2008:53) note devotion to the articles and the 1662 BCP by clergy and laity of the 1930s and 1940s and comments, their piety was individualistic, paternalistic and conservative, as to disregard biblical and theological scholarship and to disparage theological studies and bishops.

But this negative appraisal changed in the fifties courtesy of pastoral and theological talents inspired by the Inter-Varsity Fellowship among students, which paved way for the Anglican Evangelical Group Movement and the Evangelical Fellowship for Theological Literature, which provided impetus for Tyndale Fellowship for Biblical Research while liberal evangelical groups languished (Packer and Wright, 2008:53). Certainly, many of these young people became evangelical Christians with emphasis on the Bible, simple gospel doctrines on a personal relationship with Jesus Christ and Christian fellowship among themselves. It appears the faith of these young people was informed by the Anglican evangelical scholars of the day. For instance, Gills (2006:233) observes that Dr. Lloyd-Jones during the IFES forum in 1952 described the Church of Christ as made up of those who had experienced new birth [born again]. Furthermore, Gills (2006:233) notes Llyod-Jones 1950s’ argument that it is logically tenable for evangelicals to fellowship only with the true gospel-believing Christians who are not compromised by state church denomination. No wonder, young people had misgivings on the BCP and the Church of England doctrines, apart from evangelism.

The resurgence of evangelicalism was noteworthy as expressed in the Keele and Nottingham congresses of 1967 and 1977, respectively (Packer and Wright, 2008:53). Hitherto, McGrath (1993:17) and Gills (2006:240) describe the 1967 National Evangelical Anglican Congress (NEAC) meeting at Keele University as the defining moment in the history of not only the English Evangelicalism but also of the Church of England when many clergy and laity affirmed to serve within the confines of Church traditions. So, Atherstone (2008:64) cites Buchanan’s provocative essay ‘Anglican Evangelicalism: The State of the Party’, in which he declared that since Keele 1967 evangelicals had started to arise from the ghetto, to start careful open-ended and impartial reform in the Church of England.

Hence, argues MacGrath (1993:17-18), Anglican evangelicals who had previously emphasized morning and evening prayers as the only outstanding regular services, came to reaffirm the centrality of Holy Communion as administered in the local church. This is consistent with Gills’ (2006:240) sentiments that the NEAC meeting approved weekly communion as the centre of the church’s corporate service and that all in the Anglican Church are Christians, and could engage each other in ecumenical debate. That being the case, Turnbull (2007:111) observes that historically both traditions affirm the significance of the gospel for wider society, yet there are tendencies for the Anglicans to submerge underneath society while the Evangelicals retreats from society. Thus, the push for what appears like an indiscriminate unity would have led to discomfort on both the traditions.

Nonetheless, McGrath (1993:15) claims that Anglican Evangelicalism has inspired renewal in the Church of England today with worship style mostly of Evangelical orientation, which has been helpful and attractive, especially to the youth. The presence of Evangelicalism in the Anglican Church argues McGrath (1993:16) acts as a safety-belt against drawing the Anglican Christians towards American Evangelicalism, completely insensitive to the Anglican tradition, on the one hand, and on the other, profit from the worldwide evangelicalism.
This reflects Ngugi’s (2017) words of welcome to the Kenyan Anglican clergy visiting the Anglican Diocese of Chelmsford, UK (26th June – 12th July 2017) to organize a Kigoco (vibrant songs and choruses) styled worship as to vibrate the entire conference. This is a distinctively practical Anglican Evangelical service informed by the African worship dynamics. Indeed, the influence of Evangelicalism cannot be ruled out of this phenomenon alluded to in the expression of changed Evangelicalism in the Church of England in the form of style, spirituality and ethics (Packer, 1978:26-28); whereas style has appealed to the instruments of worship ranging from guitar to idioms for praises of Christ and ad hoc liturgy, spirituality and ethics have respectively been invigorated by charismatics and the proper use of worldliness.

4.4.3.1 Exclusion

In addition to the Bible, Brethren next valuable possession is the BCP. Indeed, even when some have other forums outside the church service, they wait for the end of the liturgy before excusing themselves. This demonstrates their loyalty to the Prayer Book as demonstrated by the English Ordinal that appears to represent the Anglican theology of inclusion (Chadwick, 1988:105). Thus the new Anglican Church of Kenya Kikuyu Prayer Book launched on 15th December 2010 by the then Archbishop Dr. Eliud Wabukala has encountered resistance especially from the Brethren who are yet to rise to the new vibrant worship experience. Yet the majority of the young people and the less conservative adults have embraced the New Prayer Book. This resonates with McGrath’s (1993:15) view that the Church of England Evangelical worship style has been helpful and attractive, especially to the youth.

Nonetheless, the apparent apathy towards the inclusion of the New Prayer Book in the Anglican Church of Kenya worship appears consistent with Brethren stereotyping weekly Fellowship liturgy, which is exclusive. In this regard, they ‘sleepeth” and need to awake to the reality of inclusive, dynamic worship in the Anglican Church of Kenya today, the Kigoco experience. The encouragement for the Brethren to arise and shine in the new dispensation of liturgical renewal which sounds alarm bells to the Keele 1967 acknowledgment of renewed evangelicals open-ended relationship with the Church of England (Atherstone 2008:64).

4.4.3.2 Standing firm

As seen earlier, McGrath (1993:11) indicates the BCP appears to set limits for the Church of England alongside polity and Thirty-nine articles of religion. Yet, Chadwick (1988:105) claims that the English Ordinal expresses the Anglican theology of inclusion. But this seems problematic considering Anglican tradition formularies which could to some extent inhibit open-ended bond with the Evangelicals. Furthermore, McGrath (1993:12) notes previously Anglicanism has not been bound to any set of typically exclusive doctrines instead it has embraced some theological inclusiveness in history though not without loss. For instance, Turnbull (2007:95) mentions Anglican replacement of a common prayer service with a weekly communion in the second half of the 20th century, signified a break from historic Reformed Anglican practice. Thus over the years, the Church of England has continued to stress its boundaries in the form of new prayer books or aspiring for less elegant clerical attire in a bid to be more accommodative. This lack of firmness attracts more Evangelical worship styles but might eventually lead to Anglican Evangelical, which is distinctively and exclusively amorphous, without power to stand on the evil day. Certainly, scholars are yet to find a suitable definition for the Anglican Evangelical identity.

The Keswick Movement referred to today as Keswick Ministry has become more of a biblical ministry that meets yearly in the Lake District town of Keswick, England (Porter, 1998:9-10). But, even though Brethren has lost the sting of the previous years, it appears to have somewhat stood the test of time. Admittedly, so far Brethren ethical codes have continued to draw inspiration from the dictums of the daily walk in the light. This, of course, is not without a cost as the numbers have steadily declined.

4.4.3.3 Social convention

Turnbull (2007:125-126) maintains that Charismatic renewal has impacted the Church of England in two-fold ways. Firstly, the liturgical form of charismatic worship has not only led to a less rigid service but a more creative variety. Secondly, it has resulted in the loss of form of BCP in terms of nature, theology, and content, a situation that requires reversal to enhance renewal within the framework of Anglican Evangelical tradition. The call to reinstate some form in the Anglican Evangelical worship services illustrates how complicated it is to erase a long-standing tradition. In other words, changing a social convention invites resistance. Certainly, the new Anglican Church of Kenya Prayer Book, Ibuku ria Mahoya na Magongona ma Kanitha (Book of Prayer and Church Services) has not been wholly accepted, with some congregations in the Mount Kenya region opting to continue using the Kenyan version of the BCP.

One of the striking features of Keswick and Brethren teachings is the avoidance of BCP in their fellowships and conventions. Truly, the early Keswick had a progressive Keswick Week structure-like outline that guided the morning and evening sessions. Similarly, Brethren’s fellowships appear to have taken a cue by adopting a rigid liturgical perspective which has completely relegated BCP to obscurity. Thus Brethren stereotyping liturgy (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:200) like the Church of England BCP has progressively remained conventional and out of touch with the reality of the Charismatic renewal. Indeed, one of the prominent stakeholder participants in this research rightly observes that in Kenya the EARM seems to be at the end of its natural life, in the sense that it has been overtaken by various forms of Pentecostalism.
Having analyzed the prevailing understanding of Brethren’s scriptural teachings on sanctification and holiness from the perspective of the Anglican Evangelical tradition, a new model of the theology of sanctification is necessary. While this model takes cognizance of the current Brethren interpretation of the Scriptural verses that informs beliefs and practices of walking in the light, it suggests a preferred scenario which ought to inform a theology of inclusion rather than exclusion.

As clarified earlier the exclusive motif is a dominant theme which has shaped the theology of exclusion in the EARM within the mainstream Anglican Church\(^\text{104}\). Thus, standing firm and social convention concepts though not necessarily subordinate themes in influencing the unfolding events of the current situation, are subsumed in the overall themes of exclusion. By doing this, a formulation of a current comprehensive theological model of sanctification and holiness is conceivable.

4.5.1 Prevailing theology of sanctification and holiness

Brethren’s lifestyle has been influenced by the way they interpret Scripture, which as observed earlier has been devotional and exclusively introverted. Arise Brethren excluded Stand, Kupaa, and other Christians from their fold on the basis of interpretation of Ephesians 5:14, construed to mean they were still wallowing in sin and required to wake up. The figure 1 below explicates this scenario.

On the other hand, the Stand reacted by standing firm (Ephesians 6:13) against Arise on the one hand and against Kupaa (rising up above earthly [Dan. 1:8-15]) on the other. Eventually, the three were distinct. Although Kupaa has remained distinct it appears to have merged with Stand. Arise, though now a minority of Brethren has remained consistently distinct. However, they fellowship together at the local level. It is important to note at this point, that 1 Cor. 11:13-

\(^{104}\) Anglican Church of Kenya which illustrates a social convention phenomenon subsumes all the three criteria at this point, except other Christians as shown below. The funnel (figure 2) represents Brethren at local Fellowship which incorporates all factions. It also indicates Arise distinctiveness from Stand but tied to Kupaa in the sense of simple lifestyle. This simplicity is inferred in Stand, the largest faction, which appeared to have swallowed Kupaa. Other Christians have to some extent been influenced by Brethren spirituality, thus interlock with the funnel (Brethren). They are the majority in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. At the bottom of the funnel is the social convention code derived from the Brethren beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

This exclusiveness scenario seems to draw from ecclesiastical Eclectic Society format, which appears to dictate how Brethren relate to the mainstream Anglican Church. While Stand seems more accommodative to the church polity regarding working relationship, Arise ranks a distance second orchestrated by numerous ethical codes. This is demonstrated by figure 3 below, which also shows some relationship between Stand and Arise with respect to sharing ethical codes of walking in the light.

Although most of the clergy including Bishops in the mainstream Anglican Church claim to have been born again, interrelationship with Brethren has remained strained. On the one hand, most clergy neither gives testimony nor observe daily sanctification in the form and expression that Brethren would accommodate. On the other hand, Brethren fail to participate in the church development projects and are keen on financial contribution towards Mfuko wa Bwana (the Lord’s Bag) which benefits only Brethren.

Regarding engaging with the Prayer Book, Brethren possess copies of BCP for use during mainstream Anglican services but not during their fellowship in which their stereotype liturgy takes precedence.

Indeed, Brethren are appalled by the Charismatic and Pentecostal worship styles, and this reflects on the generation gap dilemma (figure 4). In spite of the fact that Brethren Fellowships are made of older adults, there has been little effort to address the current issues that render their worship exclusively repulsive to the youth.

4.5.2 Preferred Theology of Sanctification and Holiness

Since the way Brethren interpret Scripture informs their beliefs and practices of walking in the light, a transformation to a preferred scenario is critical. It is pivotal for Brethren to understand the Holy Scriptures is God-breathed and contains all things necessary to salvation, and as such a source of hope and restoration. Therefore, since all Brethren splits share mainstream Anglican Church beliefs in the primacy of the Bible, it is likely, with informed sanctification theology and exegesis to transform the apparent exclusive scriptural teachings into an inclusive viewpoint for Brethren. It is also noteworthy that Anglican tradition holds up especially the Lambeth Quadrilateral liturgical expressions and religious observance. Following this, Brethren, who have been baptized and are partakers of Holy Communion ought to advocate for mutual sharing with clergy. In this way, a Brother who is authentically Anglican and who not only revere the Bible but is also versed with its interpretation dynamics will be the preferred model as illustrated by figure 5.
Further, a moderate Calvinism ecclesiology provides for the sufficiency of the Cross for the justified sinners, who though they may not share Brethren’s legalistic Code, are Christians just like Brethren. This concept is demonstrated by the interlocking shapes (gears) below (figure 6).

However, balancing between the extremes is necessary and within the mainstream Anglican Church structures. This predisposition will not only benefit the Anglican Church in Kenya in terms of maintaining reasoned faith but also an avenue for demonstrating conjoint and interdependent coexistence within Brethren, on the one hand, and on the other, within the body of Christ, the church. Such an inclusive concept would see more Anglican Brethren Bishops in Kenya and a more unbiased explicated practical holiness.

As mentioned earlier Brethren are keen observers of BCP as opposed to the new liturgy even when it is in vernacular. The only challenge is that BCP is rarely used in some congregations in the Mount Kenya region, which means with time Brethren might get more uncomfortable in the church. But things should not get to that extent because the new liturgy is neither too rigid not too vibrant, and thus, with guidance Brethren ought to embrace this liturgy. The figure 7 below illustrates a convergent point where the Brethren embrace the new liturgy.

Certainly, liturgical renewal pushes the Brethren to arise from hypocritical dispositions as to allow flexibilities because not everything that is worldly is sinful. Dynamic worships, well guided, become pointers of expressing the various gifts that God has endowed the church. That being the case, biblical and theological education shouldn't be worrisome to the Brethren, though theologies should be vetted to avoid extremes.

Surely, the overall objective of the shift from the current scenario to the preferred one is to glorify God. Of course, the relationship between the factions and with the mainstream Anglican Church isn't a crisis. They all appear to coexist harmoniously. However, though only suggestive, moving to untested waters for some Brethren might be a worrisome but a necessary endeavour.

4.6 BRETHREN’S LIFESTYLE IN THE ANGLICAN EVANGELICAL TRADITION; FAITHFUL PARTICIPANTS IN THE MISSIO DEI.

The central beliefs and practices of walking in the light are three-fold; born again testimony (confession of sin, and daily victory/sanctification), stereotypic worship style, and scriptural based moral codes. In order to be a faithful participant in the missio Dei, each cluster will be analyzed from the perspective of the Anglican Evangelical tradition.

4.6.1 Born again testimony

In this study understanding of a born again, testimony from the viewpoint of Brethren cannot be overemphasized. However, to place it in the framework of the Anglican evangelical tradition, a recap will suffice. The practice of born again is the most identifying signature of Brethren. However, it is important to notice that Pentecostal/charismatic churches, especially in Kenya share born again testimonies. But as this research shows, Brethren testimony is unique in that it has the past, present, and the future. It also serves as a daily occurrence register of a sanctified walk with Christ exemplified through confession of failures/sins and victories mostly in their weekly Fellowship meetings. They attribute their daily sanctification and victory over sin to the overwhelming power of Christ’s cleansing blood shed on the cross. This conviction shapes and hedges born again testimony to the point of shutting themselves from other Christians and people of God, for whom too, Christ died.

To debunk born again testimony from the viewpoint of Anglican evangelical tradition, a background of reformed doctrine is necessary. Certainly, Reformed doctrine within Anglican evangelicals does not strictly stress on the benefits of the atonement of the elect but the satisfaction of the cross for all (Turnbull, 2007:94). Indeed, Turnbull (2007:94) further observes that modern Anglican Evangelical scholars like John Stott and Peter Jensen hold the view of a moderate Calvinism which demonstrates a penal substitutionary understanding of atonement from the perspective of a Trinitarian God who is both the self-satisfaction and self-substitution. Furthermore, Packer and Wright (2008:95) state that God’s mission to the world is to redeem humanity through [substitutionary] ministry of Jesus. So Brethren’s testimony should not gratify selfish and exclusive gospel ministry but an open door through which people of God enter the kingdom. Undoubtedly, the world has been subjected to bondage and condemnation, and eagerly awaits redemption through adoption as God’s people (Romans: 8:18-25). This is consistent with Packer and Wright (2008:95) who observes that the entire mission of God to the entire creation is submitted to condemnation and reaffirmation. So, Brethren’s Confession of salvation should reach out for those living in the condemnation of sin so that together they can benefit from the covenant of grace.

Therefore, Mackenzie (2015:259), citing McLaren’s missionary focus on Jesus as a model for Christian mission, observes that churches have elevated the concept of Jesus as Saviour to the point of abandoning Jesus’ life and ministry, which emphasize following him as Lord by teaching and example. Indeed, Brethren has pursued its mission through born again testimony with emphasis on Jesus as Saviour and Lord of their lives. This would be a great Anglican Evangelical persuasion if, by way of giving testimony, Brethren are inclusive rather than exclusive. Indeed, Wabukala (2014:55) while commenting on the 39 Articles of Religion maintained that real mission should be informed by clear theological principles about the gospel without a vested interest. In light of this conviction, self-interest on the part of Brethren should take a back-seat by accommodation of different ways of expressing salvation, within the covenant of grace and faithful participation in the missio Dei.

4.6.2 Worship Styles

One of the most distinguishing elements which are distinctively Brethren is the worship style either in a mainstream Anglican Church service or their Fellowship meetings. In respect to the former, the norm is vibrant spirit dynamism blended with either BCP or the new Prayer Book liturgies. While Brethren seems happy with the BCP liturgy and some reservation to the new Prayer Book, they appear to wear faces of holy disinterestedness to the vibrant music accompanied by electric guitars and drums. About the latter, a stereotyping liturgy is a model characterized by reverential hymns, solemnly sung without musical instruments. As a result, it is rare to find young people attending Brethren fellowships.

However, Packer and Wright (2008:55) are of the view that changes in worship style are inevitable if the worship is to be real and, at least attracting young people, in what has been attributed to charismatic mostly in Britain Evangelicals and Anglican evangelicals. Also, O’Brien (2013:339) argues that worship as invitation leads to worship as participation within the body of Christ (the church) from which the people of God participates in God’s mission. This is consistent with Wright’s (2006:478) observation that mission of God propels the totality of creation and nations to the universal worship signifying an important theme of inclusiveness of Jesus’ mission (Bosch, 1991:28). Thus, O’Brien (2013:339) states that God intends the church to exist as a Shalom community where worship as participation centres on community rather than on individuality.

This being the case, Brethren’s stereotype fellowship sets itself apart from the church as participating community in the mission of God. Thus, Brethren overwhelming philosophy of beliefs and practices of walking in the light is inconsistent with Christians’ understanding of God’s mission in which Christians are invited to share in the missio Dei (Turnbull, 2007:71). In order to reflect the maxims of a worshipping community, Brethren Fellowship meetings should mirror, within the Anglican evangelical structures, the very nature of God as envisioned in the missio Dei.

4.6.3 Moral codes

Moral codes are not only Brethren’s fundamentals but also biblically based and pervade the whole life. Of all the beliefs and practices of walking in the light, codes of conduct are the most consistent feature in the sense that they dictate the style of giving a testimony and define the overall standing of a Brethren lifestyle of walking in the light. Undoubtedly, Langley & Kiggins, (1974:200) term Brethren Fellowship meetings’ liturgy, stereotype, in the sense that it begins with singing verses of Tukutendereza, opening prayer, walking in the light… and ends with saying Grace together and a final Tukutendereza. The Fellowship is punctuated with aphorisms of do’s and don'ts which appear to inform certain community standards of behaviour, without which is the world, and this displaces the gospel (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:202).

Indeed, Packer & Wright (2008:56-57) maintain that separation from the world of worldliness has been central Christian calling that recommended abstinences such as attending certain cinemas, alcoholic drinks, and fancy hairdos. But as Packer & Wright (2008:57) rightly notes the pendulum has swung the other way, “Worldliness has come to be defined…in terms of godless motives rather than of doing this or that, and it is recognized that abuse of something does not take away its proper use, nor is the use of Christian liberty identical with lawlessness or license. In place of 1 John 2:15 (‘Do not love the world’) and Romans 12:2 (‘Do not be conformed to this world’) the guiding maxims are Genesis 1:28 (‘Subdue… and have dominion’, the so-called cultural mandate) and 1 Timothy 6:17 (‘God… furnishes us with everything to enjoy’), and what appeared as barbarism is giving place to something more like humanism as a view of life, with corresponding entry into fields of thought and action which were previously taboo.”

This change seems to have set no limits to what extent one can indulge in godless motives without plunging into evil habits. Indeed, it appears by pushing for Christian liberty away from constraining social convention has led to an amorphous scenario of freelance Christian lifestyle. No wonder some English evangelicals and mostly Anglicans have expressed reservation to this trend (Packer & Wright, 2008:57). Certainly, the disgruntled minority would likely sell to Brethren the idea of a moderate shift in ethics as opposed to the majority endorsement that by all standards appear suspiciously radical.

Honestly using scripture to justify liberalism cannot be better expressed than depicted above. Thus, Wabukala (2014:60) observes that if Scripture is partially a human invention and is contextually interpreted, the claim to participate in God’s mission stands on a shaky foundation, in which objectivity of God’s word is consequently ambiguous. In addition, Wright (2006:389) brings to the perspective dynamics of ethics and mission from which Christians’ quality moral lives should be noticeable to the nations, as to bring them to glorify God. Bosch (1991:83) concurs and further asserts that a missionary community should view itself as both different from and yet committed to its environment in loving and challenging ways. This creative tension should be the way to go for Brethren as faithful participants in the missio Dei, in the context where Anglican evangelical tradition ought to find solace. In connection with this understanding Wabukala (2014:58) claims that GAFCON calls upon Anglican Communion for self-examination in God, as to remove uncertainty, so that Anglicans can wholeheartedly devote themselves to mission without confusion.

4.7 CONCLUSION

The chapter has explicated the basic missiological tenets which provide a platform to analyze the prevailing practices of walking in the light. In order to give historical-missiological perspectives on the prevailing situation, an exegetical study has been done on some of the key biblical texts related to beliefs and practices of walking in the light. This has not only informed the researcher’s theoretical framework to analyze scriptural teachings related to sanctification and holiness but also, brought to the fore new EARM models of the theology of sanctification. The study has also elucidated evangelical Anglican tradition which hinges the missiological foundations needed to critique specific tenets of the prevailing model of walking in light in EARM.
CHAPTER 5. MISSIOLOGICAL FOUNDATIONS TO CRITIQUE PARTICULAR TENETS OF WALKING IN THE LIGHT

5.1 INTRODUCTION

The chapter focuses on the missiological foundations used to critique principles of walking in the light. Whereas the scope incorporates formulations of missiological foundations, it also summarizes the prevailing situation as it is and as it should be, culminating in a viable model of missio Dei. Thus the chapter is divided into five parts. Firstly, it introduces the layout. Secondly, it develops missiological foundations informed by a framework of Christian history, biblical theology, and Christian anthropology, which critiques particular tenets. These tenets, which are three-fold include conversion, worship, and social-ethical situation. While conversion mainly incorporates born again testimony, worship and social ethical comprise respectively, a stereotype worship style and moral code lifestyle.

Thirdly, it summarizes the prevailing situation as it is today using historical and empirical analyses. A comparison is carried out between the four selected dioceses and one other diocese which did not participate in the actual research to establish validity and reliability of the research instrument. Still, to have an overall thrust into the current trend, analysis of affinity between historical and empirical trends is examined.

Fourthly, it summarizes the prevailing socio-ethical situation as it should be in the perspective of the Anglican Church mission statement in Kenya. To summarize the current trend as it should be, the view of mental, physical, spiritual and social transformation is explicated. Fifthly, this study suggests a viable biblically based model of Missio Dei. To put missio Dei into its rightful place succeeding models are brought to the fore culminating in the changed world example of walking in the light. Finally, a conclusion.

5.2 MISSIOLOGICAL FOUNDATIONS

Missiology argues Bosch (1991:9) is a branch of the discipline of Christian theology which does not only seeks to view the world in the light of the commitment to the Christian faith but also subject Christian mission to rigorous examination and assessment. Thus, Kravtsev (2012:1) puts missiology within the framework of Christian theology from which it develops its rightful role in the study of mission.

Undoubtedly, missiology is by nature a broad and somewhat fluid concept. On the one hand, its scope incorporates not only biblical, theological and historical studies but also informs social sciences and religious studies (Kravtsev, 2012:5-6). While Ott et al. (2010:xx) somewhat concur with Kravtsev, he is more comprehensive by not only unpacking social sciences and religious studies but also incorporating mission strategy. On the other hand, there appears to be no agreement among missiologists on the range of disciplines (Paas, 2016:37). This apparent variance has led to a multiplicity of views as to what are missiological disciplines. Indeed, the argument for interdisciplinary actions pervades explication of missiology, but again exact delineation remains elusive.

Thus, missiologist scholars like Baker (2014:17) and Nehrbass (2016:51) sought a three-legged stool metaphor of history, theology, and anthropology to delineate the discipline. Even then, a multifaceted quagmire continues. So, while Baker (2014:17) adds a fourth leg in the name of missionary practice or mission strategy, Nehrbass (2016:52) adds at least two more legs, demographic and strategy. Thus, Nehrbass (2016:53) observes that new legs not only weakens the significance of the stool metaphor as a heuristic device but suffers limitations, especially from scholars as to which leg is prominent.

This study will not permit discourses on the pros and cons of this metaphor; nevertheless, the three-legged concept will suffice to critique tenets of walking in the light. Thus, Christian history, Biblical theology, and anthropology (social sciences) would hinge missiological foundation to critique born again testimony (conversion), stereotyping worship (worship) and moral codes (social ethical).

5.2.1 Historical perspective of missiology on Brethren beliefs and practices of walking in the light

This section constructs the scaffolding matrix of historical missiology by exploring missiological nature of conversion, worship and social ethics from the viewpoint of Christian history.

5.2.1.1 Missiological theory of conversion in Christian history

To place conversion method within the history of missiology, an explication of its complex nature is critical. Indeed, Love (2000:231), while conceding to the significance of conversion of sinners as a way of fulfilling the Great Commission, states that the process of conversion is a multifaceted missiological subject. However, Love (2000:231) further notes that the terms επιστρεφω (turn) and μετανοια (repentance) are the most commonly used expressions to illustrate the term conversion as a turning away from evil, idolatry, dominion of sin, to light. Rambo (1990:228) holds the same view but adds that these terms in the Hebrew Bible signify a change in people's thoughts, feelings, and actions as they repent, while the New Testament depicts response to the call of God in Christ. Moreover, Kerr and Mulder (1983:ix) also assert that conversion involves a comprehensive change from one life to a more meaningful one of purity and goodness.
Having said that, a missiological perspective on conversion seems to follow the view propounded by Bosch (1991:181) which associates Christian faith to an authentic faith achieved through various epochs of Christian Church history. Therefore, this section considers the trend of conversion faith through the Early, Medieval, Reformation and modern periods.

5.2.1.1.1 Conversions in the Early Church

Following the preaching of Peter in Acts 2:22ff about 3000 people were converted leading to the birth of the Church or to what Comby (1996:3) calls, formation of a sect within many other sects. But Comby (1996:11) asserts Christian apologists did not regard Christians as an obscure sect because they were everywhere in the empire. Of note is the conversion in Armenia after Gregory the Illuminator (290 CE) preached to the king Tridates and his army leading not only to conversion of every inhabitant with all their heart but as Comby (1996:14) observes they simultaneous resulted in baptism,

“On an appointed day, after a fast, the holy man summoned the army, the king, queen Aschkhen, princess Khosrovitukha and all the great men of the kingdom, went down to the banks of the Euphrates at sunrise, and baptized them all at the same time in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit… Those who were baptized during these seven days numbered four hundred thousand.”

In the early 4th century it was noted that a significant number of barbarians were converted to Christ through evangelization of Ethiopia by Frumentius (Comby, 1996:18). This epoch also witnessed many individual conversions some construed as genuine while other were suspicious. For instance, the conversion of Constantine was hailed for declaring Christianity as the official religion of the empire and for protecting Christians who had been undergoing persecution (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:4). Despite these favours to the church, Gonzalez (1984:121,166) argues that Constantine never submitted himself for Christian instructions, instead, he regarded himself as ‘bishop of bishops’, and was, indeed baptized on his deathbed by an Arian Bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia. Thus, Kerr & Mulder (1983:4) claim that Constantine’s conversion in the early fourth century was more of a political strategy to unite the empire than religious.

Consequently, Bosch (1991:205) observes that the church was calling on Constantine, the Christian Emperor to guide the Christendom towards the unity of the empire informed by Christian faith. Certainly, the mission was expected to be the immediate concern not just for the Emperor, but also for the church because as an imitator of God the Emperor held together the religious and political offices (Bosch, 1991:205). Nonetheless, Herring (2006:53) notes that Constantine's conversion did not trigger mass conversion, which suggests Christians were still a minority even by the time of his death in 337 CE.

However, some conversions like that of the Apostle Paul and St Augustine of Hippo (one of the early church Fathers) appeared prototype. While both men experienced dramatic conversion, Paul's experience on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:3-4) demonstrates a model for transformation (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:1, 11) which Corley (1997:1) calls a fundamental archetype of religious conversion. But equally captivating is Augustine's profound long, painful psychological and intellectual pilgrimage recorded in the so called ‘Confessions’ in which God led him to faith (Gonzalez, 1984:215).

5.2.1.1.2 Conversion in the Medieval Church

During the era of Christendom (4th – 18th centuries) the Western church, which embodied the official religion of the state, expanded along the line of the Western imperial civilization (Ott et al. 2010:167). Indeed, the baptism of the king of Franks prompted conversion of barbarians (the Germans) in around 500 CE which signified conversion of their people and unity of the empire (Comby, 1996:21). Further, Comby (1996:26) argues that evangelistic methods sought to convert countries by converting the reigning princes.

Indeed, the Carolingian rulers related political conquest to conversion whereby the conquered country was divided among preachers so that baptism became a badge of loyalty on the one hand, and other, physical violence was used against pagans who resisted conversion and missionaries endorsed forced conversion (Comby, 1996:27). Ott et al. (2010:167) maintain use of force as a mission strategy was considered a legitimate tool for conversion to Christianity. Thus, Addison (1936:42) claims Willibrord missionary work in the eighth century (during Frankish-Frisian wars) sought to baptize as a way of purifying people won by the sword following the civil war after the death of Pepin in 717 CE. But Raymond Lull (1235-1315), a Franciscan from Majorca opted for a new mission strategy in North Africa that aimed at preaching to the infidels through persuasion rather than sword (Comby, 1996:46).

5.2.1.1.3 Conversion in the Reformation Church

The discoverers and Conquistadors of the new lands like Christopher Columbus, whom Pius IX wanted to canonize, associated conversion with the destruction of heresy and trade (Comby, 1996:59). Thus Comby (1996:59) notes that Columbus “wanted both to save the peoples and to sell them as slaves to finance a crusade and the recapture of Jerusalem. Before taking Indian women as concubines, the conquistadors had them baptized; even worse, before strangling the Indian emperors, they took care to have them baptized to ensure their eternal salvation.” No wonder King Afonso of Kongo complained bitterly against King Manuel of Portugal for sending him unscrupulous missional priests, though canons, bound to ordinary life and poverty, yet filled their private houses with slave girls (Baur, 1994:59). This indecent habit is consistent with Comby's (1996:73) claim that one of the failures of evangelization was mediocre clergy and baptism without catechesis. Also, Baur (1994:80) observes Father Gonsalo Silveira baptized Mwene Mutapa, his noble men, sub chiefs and more than 300 people after catechesis to Mutapa and placing a picture of ‘Our Lady’ in his bedroom. This portrait argues Baur (1994:81) made Mutapa have an inexplicable dream of a Madonna, which Gonsalo interpreted to mean that Virgin Mary wished him and his people to become Christians. This psychological manipulation of the king coupled with Portuguese Padroado that is, ecclesiastical jurisdiction to evangelize all conquered countries appeared a quick way to Christianize the newly discovered lands. However, its close link with Conquista – commercial interests’ conflicted missionary activity with trade and politics (Baur, 1994:93). In this way, Christianity’s persuasion for the pagans became untenable for it was difficult to differentiate a colonialist from a priest putting mission activities in jeopardy.

But not all were scandalous. Certainly, the conversions of Luther (1483), Ignatius Loyola (1491-1556) and John Calvin (1509-1564), among others, have had huge impacts on the Church since the Reformation era.

Luther was converted while lecturing on Paul’s letter to the Romans 1:17 from which he became convinced that it is not a matter of good works that saves but the righteousness of God by faith. On this realization, Stepanek (1986:54) illustrates Luther’s joy, “Here I felt that I was altogether born again and had entered paradise itself through open gates.” This exclamation is consistent with Marius (1999:105) who adds that Luther’s autobiographical commentary of 1545 records his great discovery on the meaning of justification by faith.

Regarding Ignatius Loyola, he was affected by military discipline such that when he suffered a life threatening injury (1521) went to recuperate at the castle of Loyola where he read devotional literature on the life of Christ, which led to his conversion. When he recovered, went on a pilgrimage to Montserrat where he had an all-night watch before the altar of the Virgin Mary. Consequently, he hung up his sword. He later had mystical experiences that became the basis of his famous work, 'Spiritual Exercises', which became the Jesuit’s manual and is commonly used during retreats today (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:25).

Concerning, John Calvin, he was converted while studying (law), thus Kerr & Mulder (1983:25) notes his testimony,

“First, when I was too firmly addicted to the papal superstitions to be drawn easily out of such a deep mire, by a sudden conversion, He brought my mind…to submission. I was so inspired by a taste of true religion, and I burned with such a desire to carry my study further, that although I did not drop other subjects, I had no zeal for them. In less than a year, all who were looking for a purer doctrine began to come to learn from me, although I was a novice and a beginner."

5.2.1.1.4 Conversion in the Early modern church

Since human rationality was viewed as a foundation to overcome superstition and solve human problems in the early modern church, Leibniz, one of the enlightenment thinkers (1697), admonished the Protestants to consider a mission as a way of civilizing the world (Ott, 2010:121). Thus, by the time John Wesley (1703-1791) was converted on May 24, 1738, he had not only completed his university degree and entered Holy Orders but had also become a resident Fellow and full-time Oxford tutor (Baker, 2000:22). Wesley achieved this in spite of spiritual struggle informed by possible waywardness illustrated by his experience with a girl, described as an unhappy love affair (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:54). Indeed, Wesley was converted before meeting with a Moravian, Peter Bohler, who mentored a saving faith in him (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:55).

Likewise, George Whitefield (1714-1770) was already doing his undergraduate studies before conversion to Methodism via Wesley in 1735 at Oxford in what he termed a new birth or personal conversion to Christ, thus becoming one of the leading Reformed evangelical Anglican clergymen in the 18th century (Gatiss, 2012:7). He later briefly separated from Wesley for placing too much stress on human effort on experiential salvation but was happy with a Calvinistic understanding of the plight of humanity before God and their inability to save themselves (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:61). No wonder Kerr & Mulder (1983:61) note the confession of his arrogance and previous brutish lifestyle which despised instruction, however, his conversion inspired revivals such as the First Great Awakening in North America.

About John Newton (1725-1807), Durnford (1942:3) notes his despicable life preceding conversion which is described in the words of 2 Peter 2:14: “Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin, beguiling unstable souls." Thus, Kerr & Mulder (1983:88) observes that Newton’s, ‘Amazing Grace’ hymn sums up his religious experience, in addition to a self-made epitaph which depicted his conversion experience. Indeed, Kerr & Mulder (1983:88) reckoned his salvation, thus, “John Newton, once an infidel and libertine, a servant of slaves in Africa, was, by the rich mercy of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, preserved, restored, pardoned, and appointed to preach the faith he had long laboured to destroy…”
5.2.1.1.5 Conversion in the modern Church

Kerr & Mulder (1983:119) show a written conversion experience in David Livingstone’s diary (1813-1873) during his 59th birthday, which goes thus, “19 March 1872 – Birthday. My Jesus, my King, my life, my all; I again dedicate my whole self to Thee. Accept me and grant, O gracious Father, that ere [before] this year is gone I may finish my task. In Jesus’ name, I ask it. Amen, so let it be”. Likewise, Dorothy Day (1897-1980) was equally pious; she maintained that Christians have scarcely begun to be Christian as to deserve the name Christian as they lived on blind and naked faith in spite of God’s intimations of immortality (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:211).

But some conversions were coerced. For instance, an 11-year old Joseph Coen was kidnapped by a priest and taken into the house of catechumens who forcefully detained him despite his tearful plea for freedom (Isser and Schwartz, 1988:50). Isser & Schwartz (1988:52) cites other abductions during the Second World War that reflected excessive religious fervour, and indifferent proselytization informed conspiracy.

Indeed, some people like David Drach converted to Catholicism in 1827 when he became convinced that the Jews had corrupted the Hebrew Scriptures [enlightenment challenge] and had his children baptized and raised as Catholics following a lawsuit against his wife who upheld Judaism (Isser & Schwartz, 1988:76).

Others were voluntary like Ethel Waters (1900-1977) who confessed not to be bound by denominational affiliation and stated her faith, thus: “I don’t say I’m a religious person. I say I’m a born-again Christian. And that is the most important thing in my life because I’ve found my living Saviour.” (Kerr and Mulder, 1983:220)

Having traced views on Christian conversion from the early church to modern, the researcher undertakes an appraisal from the viewpoint of Brethren.

5.2.1.1.6 Missiological appraisal of conversion theory from Brethren perspectives

Four conversion models adapted from ‘History of Conversion’ by Issa and Schwartz (1988:25) are used to analyze conversion method. Although Issa and Schwartz (1988:25) talk about three basic types of conversion, a fourth has been extracted from the internalized conformity cluster of intellectual or gradual, and aggressive or sudden so that the analysis will include intellectual, aggressive, compliance and developmental (as a growing/adolescence crisis). The number of clusters will not only provide a broad spectrum of analyzing conversion experiences over the centuries but also provide a robust platform to critique Brethren tenet of conversion. Thus, these models are intertwined in expression, and one might appear to infringe the other.
Firstly, an intellectual (gradual) model which appeared to attract Augustine, Luther, Ignatius, and Whitefield. Thus, while Gonzalez (1984:215) depicts Augustine's 'Confessions' informed by a painful psychological and intellectual journey that culminated in his faith, Luther's conversion pilgrimage occurred when preparing lectures on Romans (Stepanek, 1986:54). For Ignatius, he was converted on a pilgrimage as he read the life of Christ (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:15), while Whitefield's conversion led him to brief separation from Wesley over Arminianism tendencies (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:61).

Whereas the intellectual conversions appear to depict individual encounters with Christ, they seem to capture the majority of epochs. About intellectual conversions, most Brethren are uncomfortable with religious institutions which they accuse of producing not-saved graduates, who depict unstructured formats of giving testimony. Indeed, most graduates don't follow the three-forged stereotype testimony marked with experiences of past, present and future expectations. But while not denying some graduates have questionable Christian habits, the majority are theologically and spiritually mature in the light of the informed interpretation of Scripture as opposed to Brethren's devotional approach. Indeed, one of the Bishops who participated in this research has a doctorate and is a fervent member of EARM, and is frequently called upon to speak at their conventions.

Secondly, the aggressive (sudden) model finds affinity with Paul's and Calvin's dramatic conversion experiences. While Paul's encountered with Christ on the road to Damascus to persecute Christians (Corley, 1997:1), Calvin's sudden conversion inspired him to further his religious studies (Kerr & Mulder (1983:25). Most Brethren conversion testimonies depict this criterion. Indeed, some confess to getting saved in a vision, while others claim they were drunk. Truly, the majority of conversions indicate the when, how and where of salvation experience and this confirms the abruptness of the experience.

Thirdly, is the compliance model which (Isser & Schwartz, 1988:25) calls pro forma attracts a broad range of affiliates characterized by a lukewarm conversion experience. For instance, conversion of kings such as Mwene Mutapa (Baur, 1994:80-81) and Constantine (Gonzalez, 1984:166) and the king of the Franks (Comby, 1996:21) with a single aim of the unity of the people. Others were coerced to convert (Comby, 1996:59) before the discoverers and conquistadors of new territories killed them. Still others like Joseph Coen in the last half of the 19th century were abducted to receive catechism (Isser and Schwartz, 1988:50). Certainly, Brethren have no time for what looks like lukewarm Christianity. Indeed, they would view the Anglican Church from the perspective of compliance Christianity which is neither hot nor cold. Undeniably, they mostly use Revelation 3:15-16 to exclude other Christians from their Fellowships.
Fourthly, Developmental model (likened to the growing crisis) which is neither intellectual nor traumatic. This category finds affinity with Wesley’s, Newton’s and Livingstone’s spiritual journey (Kerr & Mulder, 1983:55, 87,119) respectively. Whereas Wesley had a crisis of a saving faith, Newton’s hymn of Amazing Grace sums up his conversion pilgrimage while Livingstone’s rededication of the entire life illustrates his conversion experience. This model sounds alarm bells to sanctification crisis of consecration during early Keswick Conventions in which a Christian was ushered into the process of victorious life of surrender and faith, or Let go, and let God (Naselli, 2010:199-200). The affinity of conversion experience is outstanding for Brethren because they believe in a born again process that elevates them above other Christians. Although Newton and Livingstone’s conversion experience for Brethren is not a prototype, Wesley’s understanding of entire sanctification is behind holiness tradition which is a precursor of Keswick theology (Turnbull, 2007:78-79), which is believed to have influenced EARM beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

5.2.1.2 Missiological theory of liturgical worship in Christian history

5.2.1.2.1 Worship in the Early Church

Dyrness (2009:5-6) claims that worship practices are the mutual heritage which unites Christians together with God. This unity echoes the worshipping community of Christians in the early church who while they viewed with suspicion, nevertheless had a strong sense of fellowship with the risen Christ and with one another (Hardman, 1937:3). Furthermore, argues Wegman (1985:53), now that the church was publicly recognized, a liturgy was envisioned. Although many people embraced Christianity, there was no apparent Christian practice, as most joined the church for the accruing favours from the state.

5.2.1.2.2 Worship in the Medieval Church

Dyrness (2009:19) while commenting on the symbolism of medieval worship claims that comfort for medieval people came from their understanding of the world as a unified dramatic process from birth to grave reiterated in the weekly mass, which eventually assumed liturgical form. This understanding resonates with Luther’s concept of Babylonian captivity which tied the medieval person from the cradle to the grave in the light of the seven sacraments which ranged from baptism to extreme unction. Dyrness (2009:20) argues that from around 1200 the celebration of mass started to focus on the gesture of the priest as he raises the host and signals when it has converted into the body of Christ, and all the senses are called into play. Also, Wegman (1985:230) states that ringing of a bell indicated the moment of consecration in the context of grave silence by the faithful onlookers.
Thus, Wegman (1985:229) illustrates the Eucharistic experience in what many believers construes a repetition of Christ’s sacrifice, but theologians describe it as re-presentation in signs of bread and wine. Whatever the views of the precise form of Christ's presence in the mass, claims Dyrness (2009:24), God’s universal presence in worship informs a real presence of Christ. In spite of the abuse of religious objects and images, the decisive role (the metaphysics of worship) concerning symbolic acts and objects played a central role in worship during this era (Dyrness, 2009:31-32). Thus many in the churches while acknowledging the need for reform were of the view of addressing the abuses without harming the practice which nourished the worship life of medieval believers (Dyrness, 2009:32-33).

5.2.1.2.3 Worship in the Reformation Church

This period ushers in a concerted effort by Martin Luther to purge abuses of worship particularly the indulgences as expressed in his famous 95 theses, nailed to the door of the Wittenberg Castle Church on October 31, 1517 (Nichols, 2002:5). Thus, Dyrness (2009:33) notes Luther’s concern that these practices corrupted worship as they had become instruments of God’s mercy instead of a means of spiritual discipline. Luther’s historic discovery that the just live by faith led him to suggest that it is the word of God that stops abuses and not outward expressions, though he was comfortable with the medieval structure of the mass (Dyrness 2009:34). However, Wegman (2009:306) notes some of Luther’s followers were making irresponsible and radical worship reforms, as to force Luther to suggest modest liturgical revisions. Indeed, John Calvin pushed away from medieval practices through his famous Institutes, which taught about Christian life and elaborated Luther’s concept of faith in systematic form for believers (Dyrness, 2009:37). However, like Luther, Calvin’s conceptual framework of worship services in Geneva resonates the medieval mass, though the relationship between the believers and worship practices were theologically explicated (Dyrness, 2009:37). Hence, Wegman (2009:306) contends that it was only Zwingli who appeared consistent in liturgical reformation.

5.2.1.2.4 Worship in the Church of England – Reformation to modern

Indeed, reform in the Church of England began with a royal refutation of the pope’s authority that led to the removal of not only medieval abuses but to the revision of liturgical forms of worship (Hardman, 1937:158). This review gave rise to a reformed Catholicism with all trappings of Apostolic Church fundamentals, though neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant (Hardman, 1937:159). Indeed, in spite of perpetuation of certain Protestant tenets the church of England did not predispose itself to Protestant revolutionary spirit, although Protestantism continued to challenge until the restoration of the monarchy in 1660 when it aligned itself with non-conformist sects outside the church of England (Hardman, 1937:159).
Bradshaw (1991:72) singles out the forms of Morning and Evening Prayer as the most defining features of the Anglican tradition which emerged in the first Anglican Prayer Book of 1549 and have weathered through successive editions of the book in the Anglican Communion. Furthermore, argues Hardman (1937:161), this first English Prayer-Book, which contained all the revised services in English was issued in 1549 and supplemented by the Ordinal in 1550 before its edition and publication in 1552 before interruption by Mary when she succeeded Edward VI in 1553. But with the reign of Elizabeth in 1558-1603, the English BCP was restored, slightly revised in line with Church of England’s Catholic position (Hardman, 1937:160). This restoration saw the Consecration of Matthew Parker as Archbishop of Canterbury (1559) as a safeguard of the apostolic succession of the ministry (Hardman, 1937:161).

Thus, the Reformation of the medieval Church of England attracted opposition from liberals and conservatives rendering Acts of Uniformity a failure with a minority laity adhering to the old order, others, Protestants and a pro-reform majority who beheld a new sense of the importance of BCP (Hardman, 1937:164). However, Bradshaw (1991:75) observes that Anglican orders of daily prayer still require more revision alongside the traditional models in a way that appropriate those who want to associate with the church’s prayer life. Thus, Roberts (1991:82) acclaims the Church of England’s Alternative Service Book (1980) as the most influential liturgical example that for instance, retains confirmation as distinct in initiation service after baptism. This liturgical disposition is opposed to the Episcopal Church of the United States’ (ECUSA) 1979 Prayer Book which recommended confirmation to be an elective pastoral office (Roberts, 1991:82). This recommendation resonates with ACK’s New English Prayer Book that tends to open the door for the baptized adult to partake the Eucharist. However, this rubric is in practice largely ignored.

The other significant heritage from the medieval church is a 3-fold ministry of bishops, priests, and deacons, and while rejecting papalism, bishops’ proper status was restored, the diaconate permanent ministry status was lost, and replaced with a probationary status to the priesthood (Hardman, 1937:165). Indeed, Spinks & Tellini (1991:116) maintain that Chicago Lambeth Quadrilateral resolved to preserve the office of episcopacy which informed Anglican union with other churches from the perspective of episcopacy and an Ordinal with the three-fold ministry. Indeed, the English Ordinal corrected the notion of the almost exclusive occupation of the priesthood with the celebration of the mass, thus emphasizing pastoral and prophetic functions, as well as giving importance to the imposition of hands and prayer to the Holy Spirit as the essential elements of ordination (Hardman, 1937:165). Thus, Spinks & Tellini (1991:116) contend that the Ordinal is not only a hallmark of Anglicanism but a bridge church between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.
Following the above discussion on some of the heritage of the Church of England from the medieval and the Reformation, it is critical to recognize the widespread appeal of public worship regarding spontaneity of congregational singing. Thus, Stancliffe (1991:124) notes remarks by a four years old watching a televised service from Exeter Cathedral, “Now I know why the churches are true…The people in them enjoy singing, and walk about in patterns.” Indeed, this observation appears to reflect charismatic worship in the Church of England, which according to Steven (2002:1), is one of the two significant developments since 1960. Certainly, Steven (2002:1) notes that the Alternative Service Book (ASB) of 1980 hailed an important milestone in the history of Anglican worship since 1662 and continued with ASB’s successor, Common Worship, which depicts new ritual structures and liturgical language for congregational worship. The second development has been the proliferation of the Pentecostal worship styles related to the Charismatic Movement (Steven, 2002:1).

5.2.1.2.5 Missiological appraisal of worship theory from Brethren perspectives

A three-forged way informs this appraisal; worship as a fellowship, worship as a renewal and worship as a spiritual discipline.

Firstly, worship as a joint fellowship is a prominent theme throughout the Christian church worship history as supported by liturgical scholars like Hardman (1973:3) who portrays church as a worshipping community of Christians. Furthermore, Spinks & Tellini (1991:116) observe Chicago Lambeth Quadrilateral motif of the unity of Anglican and other churches. Thus, Stancliffe (1991:124) and Steven (2002:1) note spontaneity of congregational singing (charismatic worship) arising from charismatic influence and improved liturgical structures and languages since 1960.

While worship dynamics in the early church may not parallel the current trend, it is centred nevertheless on a personal and corporate relationship with Christ and other Christians. In this regard, Brethren’s Fellowship is a prime example of collective worship par excellence from the perspective of their Fellowship meetings where among other elements of worship they sing, confess their sins and hear the word of God (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:200). The challenge with this Fellowship liturgy is not necessarily a tendency towards legalism but the nature of stereotyping that excludes other Christians. It appears then to be a joint fellowship for members of EARM while those Christians who neither walk in the light nor attend fellowship are shut out.

In a nutshell, a sectarian- like scenario of a belief system that is not only introverted but more so considers itself pompous. But, Nikolajsen (2013:463) argues that God who is triune, God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit depicts a community existence of love, which is apparently lacking within the Brethren’s exclusive lifestyle. Furthermore, Nikolajsen (2013:465) uses the biblical term koinonia to express not only fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 1:9) but also with other members of the local church (1 John 1:3) as part of the mission of the church. So, Brethren fellowship may not align with this understanding of mission from the perspective of koinonia.

Secondly, worship renewal dynamics in the Church of England, while sensitive to the church tradition over the centuries continue to inform the worship style creatively. Thus, Hardman (1937:164) notes that worship reform in medieval Church of England faced opposition. Surely, Wegman (2009:306) observes Luther’s cautious approach that while he did not object to liturgical revisions, he nevertheless advocated for modest reforms. So, Roberts (1991:82) cites the Church of England’s ASB (1980) and ECUSA (1979) Prayer Book, their divergent approaches notwithstanding, as prime examples of liturgical renewal in the 20th century.

While one of the primary purposes of the Church worship is a contextual and authentic celebration of the kingdom of God on earth, it nevertheless calls for its active participants in the mission of God. Indeed, Wright (2006:478) states that missiological significance of worship for the people of God is to lead the creation and nations to universal worship. This missiological trend is apparently consistent with worship dynamics throughout Christian history. However, Brethren as a worship community resists any form of renewal of its liturgy. This resistance has led to the static liturgy overtaken by time which has had serious consequences exemplified by the low turnout for fellowship meetings. This situation falls short of what Ott et al. (2010:159) term kingdom communities that demonstrate a passion for obeying God’s will not only with all their being but also live their lives as a holy sacrifice. Although their calling is to a large extent clear and sacrificial, their stagnant liturgical growth does not only endanger their future survival but appear inconsistent with the principle of participation in the missio Dei.

Thirdly, worship as a spiritual discipline, Dyrness (2009:20) and Wegman (1985:230) observe that celebration of mass focused on a priest who signals when the host has converted into the body of Christ. Although symbolic acts and objects informed metaphysics of worship, it was a concern for Luther that these practices would subvert spiritual discipline (Dyrness, 2009:32-33).

The theme of spiritual discipline is considered the hallmark of Brethren lifestyle as expressed in the way they give their testimony and frequents fellowship meetings. This idea which appears to pervade the Medieval and the Reformation Church tends to find affinity with Brethren, albeit from a different perspective. While at one end of continuum worship dynamics in the Medieval Church focused reverently and exclusively on the priest during the mass, at the other end of the continuum, Brethren self-righteously and solely focus on themselves. In this way, the Medieval Church and Brethren appear to focus on outward practices as instruments of God’s mercy instead of viewing them as means of spiritual exercises. Thus, Brethren’s emphasise beliefs and practices of walking in the light not only betrays their focus on their central tenet, the cross of Christ, but also tend to undermine the gospel for the perceived poor (in spirit), who by Brethren’s legalistic discipline locks them out of fellowship.

But since the church orients itself toward the coming kingdom of God it should not isolate itself from the society because being missional does not virtually eradicates sectarianism (Nikolajsen, 2013:470). Following this argument, if Brethren could reverse their focus to Christ and the Gospel, instead of self-righteous codes of conduct, a spiritual discipline informed by the inclusive embrace of other Christians will attract not only spiritual growth but also numbers. Thus argues Ott et al. (2010:160), the work of missions is the sending out activity of the church to expand Christian communities among all humanity. If the Brethren’s informed spiritual discipline appropriates this principle of missions, they might regain their respect as a missional community.

5.2.1.3 Missiological theory of social ethics in Christian history

A working description of social ethics by Carroll (2000:321) appears to suffice the needed understanding and perspective of this segment. Thus, Carroll (2000:321) defines social standards generally as the shared moral values and behaviour in a particular context, in which he associates identity and duty with Christian faith, tradition, and community. However, this integration into the community around them ought to strike a balance between church tradition and the contextual, cultural setting (Carroll, 2000:321).

5.2.1.3.1 Social ethics in the Early Church

This age was dominated by Hellenistic-Roman civilization informed by systems of thoughts such as one model of society, one body of law and one universe of ideas, which Christianity had to permeate (Walls, 1996:18). Nonetheless, contends Gonzalez (1984:91), the majority of Christians in the first three centuries fitted into the lower strata of society. Conversely, Bosch (1991:193) observes that by the time of Constantine the church had become the bearer of culture and a civilizing instrument in society. This, observes Bosch (1991:193) for theological and cultural reasons meant Christians were the civilized and educated, thus, mission movement was from the superior (Christians) to the inferior (non-Christian) faiths. Certainly, argues Ott et al. (2010:120), civilization was construed to mean a deliberate attempt by missionaries to bring both the gospel and the culture of their sending church to non-Christian societies. Furthermore, Bosch (1991:201-202) claims that the monastic movement which flourished during the last quarter of the third century and the first quarter of the fourth century was essentially the real bearer of the missionary ideal and practice that saw the disintegration of rural paganism in the entire Greco-Roman world. Indeed, following the Constantinian era, martyrdom was no longer required because the ascetics were viewed to have replaced physical martyrdom\(^{105}\) with a spiritual one as a protest against worldliness (Bosch, 1991:202,231).

5.2.1.3.2 Social Ethics in the Medieval Church

Bosch (1991:202) asserts that since the fourth century the history of the church, especially in the East, was associated with the history of monasticism. Whereas the Eastern monasticism was a private affair (eremitic), the Western monasticism was fundamentally communal (cenobitic) and prudently structured and highly regarded by the general populace (Bosch, 1991:231). For instance, Addison (1936:75) observes that the missionary role of monasticism in Ireland and Scotland compelled the Celtic Church to organize itself virtually on monastic lines such that all the missionaries were monks and lived in monasteries. However, argues Bosch (1991:233), monks were not deliberately missionary, though their conduct was a missionary.

Therefore, Addison (1936:75) further quotes Dowden who notes, “The monastery was everywhere the home and Seminary of Christian learning, the centre of Christian work, and everywhere, as it were, the military base of operations against the powers of heathendom.” Bosch (1991:230) notes that from 5th to 12th centuries the monastery was both the centre of cultural civilization and mission and saved the medieval church from complacency. Undoubtedly, the Irish monks, for example, are said to have contributed most to the tradition of learning and educational activities following the decline of Byzantine Empire (Bosch, 1991:233). Thus, argues Bosch (1991:232) monks had resilience attitude such that when barbarians burnt down monasteries and had them killed or driven out, the survivors would reconstitute the tradition, singing the same liturgy, reading the same books and thinking the same as their forerunners.

Bosch (1991:232) further notes monk’s exemplary lifestyle impacted on the peasants, and their conduct praised by the Celtic monk Columban (543-615) quoted in Baker (1970:28), “he who says he believes in Christ ought to walk as Christ walked, poor and humble and always preaching the truth”. Although monks were poor, they worked hard such that secular historians acknowledged their contribution to agricultural restoration in Europe (Bosch, 1991:232; Gonzalez, 1984:145). Indeed, their economic lifestyle provided alms for the poor and neglected peasants, and correspondingly transformed the social values that had subjugated the Empire’s slave ownership society (Bosch, 1991: 232; Addison, 1936:78).

\(^{105}\) Bosch (1991:231) notes McNally (1978:110) suggestion of three types of martyrdom in the 8th century Irish Cambrai Homily which symbolized three stages of martyrdom categorized thus; white (asceticism), green (contrition and penance), and red (total mortification for Christ’s sake).
Further, Addison (1936:76) claims that the Celtic monastic church was primarily a tribal institution which served as a centre of family relations to the founder of the monastery, whereby the abbots typically succeeded each other from the founder’s kin. This is consistent with Gonzalez (1984:145) who adds that monks vowed obedience to succeeding abbots. This family conception of the community called its members brothers and at times sons of the abbot and had categorized roles.

However, this approach changed as Bosch (1991:223) notes that during the era of Gregory the Great, the unbaptized peasant’s labourers burdened with rent and in the case that one was a slave would be beaten and tortured while free men were jailed. Indeed, pagans were harassed from every side, thus, argues Markus (1970:32) while bishops were threatened with severe consequences if peasants in their estates were heathen, the local military commanders and the local governor were compelled to convert the pagans. Besides, argues Bosch (1991:223) international law since its origin in the late medieval ages was inclined to refuse non-Christians the same rights as Christians, leading to indirect missionary warfare and eventually direct missionary war. Talbot (1970:52) maintains that Boniface actively enforced Christian faith to the extent that no one could choose either one way or the other of particular portions but to abide by the whole doctrine, authority, tradition, and discipline without question.

5.2.1.3.3 Social ethics in the Reformation Church

Bosch (1991:260) observes that while Western Christians in this era did not isolate cultural uplift as a mission goal, they nevertheless regarded their culture as superior to that of non-Western nations. The assumption was that establishment of God’s rule would civilize people’s lifestyle in what Cotton Matter (1663-1728) quoted by Hutchison (1987:29) in Bosch (1991:260) avers, “The best thing we can do for our Indians is to Anglicize them.” This patronizing attitude is consistent with Boxer’s (1970:88) claim that Jesuit missionaries were prejudiced against Indian students training for ordained ministry as depicted by Hilaire Belloc’s aphorism: “The Faith is Europe, and Europe is the Faith.” Furthermore, Boxer (1970:88) notes somewhat disparaging remarks made by Rector Padre Antonio Gomes to the effect that Indian people are mostly poor-spirited so that, Portuguese laymen would only go for confession to a purebred Portuguese priest. No wonder, the humanist Desiderius Erasmus (1466-1536) associated missionary work to civilizing or taming of wild peoples (Ott et al., 2010:121). Indeed, Ott et al. (2010:120) argues that the collective practice amongst early Roman Catholics and Protestant missionaries was to 106 Old devoted ones conducted religious services and transcribed the Scriptures, followed by working brothers (manual labour) and finally, younger ones under instruction, no wonder all property was jointly owned and monks observed vows of poverty, celibacy and obedience (Addison, 1936:77).

5.2.1.3.4 Social-ethics in Early Modern Church

It is hard to differentiate Western culture from Christian culture during this period because missionaries did not only bring the gospel but also the culture of the sending church as it was found moral to civilize heathen savages (Ott et al., 2010:120). Indeed, Bosch (1991:291) claims that technological and scientific advancement that followed the Enlightenment period put the West above the rest of the world even regarding religion. Thus, while heathen nations were associated with darkness, blindness, superstitions and ignorance, the West was compared to light, vision, enlightenment, and knowledge (Bosch, 1991:291). Furthermore, Ott et al. (2010:121) note Gottfried Leibniz’s (1646-1716) Enlightenment motive for mission stimulated the cultural expansion of Christianity rather than soteriology.

Still, argues Bosch (1991:292) during the early stages of the modern mission the Christian West had the prerogative to impose its views on others. Therefore, Ott et al. (2010:121) avers, “missionaries until the twentieth century considered it an act of compassion not only spiritually but also socially to bring the savages out of their darkness and to share with them the fruits of Western civility and culture”. Truly, argues Ott et al. (2010:121) failure to civilize the natives was construed as moral negligence tantamount to debasing their humanity.

In addition, Bosch (1991:292) in reference to Hutchison (1987:15,29,65) notes that the objective of the American Board was not only to make American Indians speak the English language and civilize their habits but also to Christianize them, a tendency that did not consider the perception of Indians whatsoever. This ethnocentric predisposition blurred the advocates of mission as to confuse their ideals and values with Christianity principles so that emphasis on Western standards and suppositions appeared to polarize the proprieties of traditional societies (Bosch 1991:294).

Bosch (1991:296) maintains during the 18th and early 19th century the question of priorities between civilization and Christianization was not pronounced until the latter half of the 19th century when priorities were specified. Thus, Protestant missions had sought to establish independent younger churches which were to be self-governing, self-propagating, and self-supporting. However, by the beginning of the 20th century, this idea was shelved by the pervasive benevolent paternalism (Bosch, 1991:295). This paternalistic attitude somewhat confirmed by the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference (1910), which directed missionary societies to treat younger churches like children not yet come of age, which needed benevolent control and guidance (Bosch, 1991:295). Indeed, Ott et al. (2010:123) contend that missionary motifs of civilizing which was expected to prepare the way for the gospel were unfortunately mostly linked with colonialism. This perspective sounded alarm bells to the 19th-century European dominance in the African missions. As Baur (1994:122) claims missions of Abeokuta and Ibadan opted to submit to the European bishop rather than their kind (Bishop Samuel Adjai Crowther) because the authority of the mission was in the hands of the white man.

Thus, Walls (1996:103) reckons Christianization of Sierra Leone in West Africa blended European and African elements such that European institutions were not only adopted into an African context but were also transformed by it, as exemplified by the Krio (Creoles) community. Thus, Walls (1996:103) observes,

“The self-conscious Christian community flocked to buildings looking like English parish churches in villages called Leicester, Gloucester, Kent, or Sussex, Wilberforce, Bathurst, Waterloo, or Wellington…. They wore European dress, as good as they could afford… and lived in houses influenced by European models. They were a literate community too… developed their grammar schools, for boys and for girls; and their higher education institution at Fourah Bay College in which by the 1870s it was possible to take degrees in arts and theology.”

As a result of their spirited attempt to model European’s culture Krio failed to integrate into the tribal society as they appeared more inclined to the acquisition of wealth, which hindered mission to their envious poor blood-brothers in the hinterland (Baur, 1994:377). Thus, Bosch (1991:404) claims that there is no room for a gospel that is indifferent to the needs of humanity because successful evangelism informs social conditions.

Since Krio was also an African community, a distinctly Krio expression of Christianity emerged, though where Krio culture and church differed from that of Britain was blamed on imperfections associated with ignorance which required time and patience to correct (Walls, 1996:103). Indeed where an African syntax developed, Englishmen called it broken English, or bad English and never occurred to them that it was a new language with an English vocabulary (Walls, 1996:103). Thus Krio Church got a new identity, and as Walls (1996:103) observes, to this day, they use English for liturgy and preaching confirming their status of loss from their once coherent society. Thus, Ott et al. (2010:120) confirm the 21st-century perspective, which censures the merge of western culture and the gospel, along with the evils of imperialism and ethnocentrism.

A reflection on the social, ethical framework of mission from the standpoint of Brethren crafted into three-fold clusters of civilization, Christianization, and commerce.

Firstly, civilization phenomenon in the Christian church has apparently reinforced the fact that one society regards itself more cultured than the other. This ethnocentric biased approach to mission sometimes demonstrated by use of derogatory language such as savage seems to blur mission principle propriety of social, ethical life of traditional societies (Bosch, 1991:294). Indeed, Christianity appears to have come to pagans clothed in the western culture such that it was difficult to differentiate Western culture from a Christian culture and yet carried the moral mandate to civilize what Ott et al. (2010:120) refer to as heathen savage. Such racist approach to social life would have most likely found resistance to penetrate the mission arena. Truly, racism is confirmed by Bosch (1991:260) and Boxer (1970:88) who note Portuguese laymen would only go for confession to a Portuguese priest.

Still, Baur (1994:122) describes a situation where a section of mission in West Africa chose to stay under a white bishop reckoned to wield authority, which is consistent with the treatment of younger churches like children (Bosch, 1991:295). Of course following the Enlightenment era the Western culture advanced in technology as to be associated with light and vision, while savages associated with darkness and ignorance (Bosch, 1991:291). This apparent disparity naturally prejudices one society over the other and brings forth a missiological challenge. While the western culture felt compelled with compassion to civilize savages, it never occurred to them that other worldviews matter, however retrogressively. Indeed, the Krio community suffered alienation from their culture so much so that unto this day they preach and conduct their liturgy in English (Walls, 1996:103). Similarly, freed slaves at Freretown on the Coast of East Africa appear not only to have been uprooted from their culture but were also subjected to baptism as a condition for settlement rather than the beginning of a Christian journey (Baur, 1994:230-231).

Brethren's disposition depicts grace of God. Indeed, they don't only dress modestly, but are clean, smart and seemingly loving caring. However, this is more aligned to their fellow Brethren than other Christians and curtails mission. Furthermore, walk in the light as a motif for civilization predisposes other Christian's inferior and are thus excluded from their fellowship. In other words, other Christians are expected to learn from Brethren cultural innovations informed by beliefs and practices of walking in the light. However, unlike the Western civilization, one of the ways to culture other believers is through well-informed testimonies and inclusive evangelistic fellowships, which Brethren should cultivate.
Indeed, Brethren’s lifestyle depicts a superiority phenomenon to what might be termed injurious to mutual societal coexistence. Their self-elevated social disposition appears not only hypocritical but also ironical considering majority are illiterate. This disadvantages mission practices which require informed exegesis of Scripture. Surely one of the precious companions of Brethren is a copy of Scripture which is read mostly devotionally, unlike monks who were believed not only to hold the church traditions and scripture together during medieval ages (Bosch, 1991:230) when the church was complacent, but had responsibility for enhancing cultural civilization and mission. So, if Brethren could embrace theological studies, in addition to their commitment to fellowship meetings, they would be a great source of social-ethical codes of inclusion that would inform mission.

Secondly, undoubtedly Christianization is a common ethical motif. Indeed Gonzalez (1984:18-19) notes the church since the early church has been a living evidence of unity in diversity, which was carried forward through monasticism, reckoned (Bosch, 1991:201-202) to be the real bearer of the missionary ideal and practice. Surely, monks’ resilience tendency during a medieval era not only safeguarded church tradition but also challenged believers to imitate the life of Christ (Bosch, 1991:232) in what appears like family community comprised of brothers and sisters with the Abbot being the father figure (Gonzalez, 1984:145). However, overzealousness for conversion made some Christian leaders declare war against heathen peasants (Markus, 1970:32) leading to what Bosch (1991:223) calls indirect and direct missionary warfare.

Brethren’s concept of Christianization seems to some extent to mimic the early church in the sense that it depicts unity in diversity during the local Fellowship meetings where they share testimonies and walk in the light with one another. This unity which is also reflected by the monks during the medieval period (Bosch, 1991:232; Gonzalez, 1984:145) exemplified in the way they regard one another as brothers or sisters in the Lord. Nonetheless, while the monks’ Christian ethos informed almsgiving to the needy outside their borders, Brethren appear to care mostly for their own kind exclusively.

Thus while monks’ mission endeavours have received accolades (Bosch, 1991:230-231), Brethren’s inward and exclusive social networking by all standards appear selfish and hypocritical (Langley & Kiggins, 1974:202). If weighed against Christ’s teaching about love (Matt. 22:39), Brethren would be found wanting. Nevertheless, Brethren’s exclusive love for one another is something to be endeared and a profound missiological principle based on the centrality of the Cross. If this concept of brotherly-sisterly love extends to other Christians, then mission in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region, will not only enhance its cooperation in the missio Dei but also place Brethren at the very centre of centripetal-centrifugal mission dynamics.
On the side of commerce, monks, like in the social ethics of Christianity and civilization seems to control the economy of the day. The monastery was the centre of Christian work, and the military base of operations against heathendom (Addison, 1936:75). Certainly, although monks were poor, their contribution to agricultural restoration in Europe led to economic lifestyle that transformed the social values as they provided alms for the poor and neglected peasants; nonetheless under Gregory the Great, the unbaptized peasants' labourers were burdened with rent to coerce conversion (Bosch, 1991:223,232).

But then in the modern era, the social, ethical pendulum appeared to have swung from alms and poverty informed conversion to search for economic gain at the expense of the mission. Krio community in West Africa failed to integrate into the tribal society as they appeared inclined to the acquisition of wealth, which hindered mission to the poor (Baur, 1994:377). This tendency resonates with some Bombay Africans like William Jones who had interacted with the Western culture sought for socio-economic recognition leading to resignation from the Freretown mission for a better paying job in government to the detriment of the mission (Sundkler & Steed, 2000:554).

One of the identifying characteristics of Brethren is that majority are physically poor but apparently satisfied with whatever little at their disposal. This poverty, on the one hand, is attributed to the hard economic situation in the agricultural sector particularly in the rural Kenya where rain is unreliable for commercial farming. On the other hand, some Brethren appear so entangled with the running of the Revival Fellowships and conventions that they do not have time to properly manage their farms. Nevertheless, whatever little they get, part of it goes to what has been referred to as Mfuko wa Bwana (Lord’s Bag) to cater for needy Brethren or to use during preparation for their local and international conventions (Mambo, 1973:115). Although, it does not mean monks had no flaws, they were hardworking and though poor were exceedingly generous to the needy. Truly, some Brethren would rather fail to contribute financially to church needs but not fail the Lord’s Bag. This attitude raises missiological concerns about church funded missions which require Brethren participation as partakers of the mission of God (Ott et al. (2010:213).

Following this, Brethren, unlike Krio and Bombay Africans appear not quite enterprising with money making business. Indeed, the concept of poverty seems to a section of Brethren as destiny. The teaching of Kupaa faction (inspired by Daniel 1:8ff) could have had a hand in some Brethren lifestyle exemplified in their simple and cheap weddings, anything beyond that is termed worldly. Additionally, some avoid taking bank loans for reasons among others the inability to repay and consequently embarrass their Fellowship. For the same reasons, many Brethren don’t join social, economic community welfare organizations which could cushion loan repayments and improve their financial lifestyle. Certainly, while not applauding the use of money for promoting ungodly projects, mission funding by all and sundry is a noble duty for a
church missions.

5.2.2 Theological perspective of missiology on Brethren beliefs and practices of walking in the light

This section constructs the framework setting of mission theology by exploring the missiological theory of conversion, liturgical worship and social ethics from the viewpoint of Christian faith.

5.2.2.1 Missiological theory of theology of Christian conversion

The theological basis of Christian conversion is at the very centre of God’s plan for the salvation of humanity. Strahler (2010:20) depicts conversion as a radical turning around which is derived from the Hebrew word שׁוּב (shuv) and Greek word επιστρέφω (epistrepho) which means to return in response to God’s saving activity. Thus, to explicate Brethren’s view of conversion from a missiological theology perspective, it is significant to explore its theological basis. Indeed, argues Morris (1981:42), Christian conversion derives from the nature of the living God who is a missionary and reaches out to humanity to experience conversion. This nature of God will inform the nature of theology of conversion within the framework of missiology. The nature of Christian conversion is viewed from two progressive viewpoints, which are faith and repentance.
But firstly it is critical to distinguish conversion from regeneration.

5.2.2.1.1 Conversion and regeneration

Whereas in regeneration humanity are passive participants such that their part is to hear the gospel so that the Spirit creates embracing faith; conversion predisposes humans as active participants (Horton, 2011:576). Also, Frame (2013: 945) terms regeneration as a new birth or new heart subsequent to God’s call to fellowship with Christ, which is the first effect of calling that occurs in believers. Thus, while Best (1981:12) concurs, he further contests against those who believe the subject is active at the achieving of the new birth. Thus, argues Horton (2011:576), unlike regeneration, conversion is action oriented (Phil. 2:12-13) in the sense of working out salvation in a genuine covenant relationship in Christ, which manifests through repentance and faith upon which ensues justification.

This understanding is consistent with Frame (2013:998) who sees faith and repentance as two legs upon which conversion rest, whereby the two legs describe regeneration response to God’s calling to turn to Christ as Lord and Saviour (faith) and turn away from sin (repentance).
Then follows justification, adoption, and sanctification, in which respectively God declares legal standing, becomes sons and daughters of God and develop the regenerate nature to renew the converted in the image of Christ (Frame, 2013:998). Implicated in this research is the trio of justification, adoption, and sanctification, but more so in the context of sanctification and holiness which hinge this study. Nevertheless, the triad will no doubt play a significant role in the reflection on the Christian conversion theory from the perspective of mission theology. Attention now turns to the two legs that depict conversion theory, namely repentance, and faith, which together Frame (2013:951) calls conversion.

5.2.2.1.2 Christian Conversion viewed as repentance

As seen above the key Hebrew word to define repentance in the Old Testament is shuv שׁוּב to return or to go back (2 Chron. 7:14) which Strahler (2010:21) describes as genuine repentance of people leaving evil as a result of godly sorrow for sinful actions. A good example is Numbers 21 where Best (1981:89-91) illustrates Israelites’ sin that led God to send fiery serpents which killed many people, and they based their salvation on looking at the brass serpent. No wonder salvation defines God’s identity because he is the one who saves [Ps 68:20] (Wright, 2006:118).

Indeed, Strahler (2010:21) further claims that the word επιστρέφω (epistrepho), which is frequently used in the LXX to render the Hebrew shuv, does not only denote to return, but also to turn toward, or to convert. Other Greek words used in the New Testament for repentance are μεταμελέομαι and μετανοέω (Strahler, 2010:21). On the one hand, metamelomai translates repentance as to have a feeling of care, concern, or regret, and thus stressing the emotional aspect of repentance depicted as regret for the wrong done (Strahler, 2010:21). This emotional perspective of repentance is not merely change of mind or what Horton (2011:577) terms intellectual, but involves the whole person.

On the other hand, metanoeo translates repentance as not only to have a change of mind but also to think differently about something, thus expressing the idea of repentance as an alteration, a conversion which influences the moral conduct (Strahler, 2010:21). Thus, Bosch (1991:105) states that Jesus did not come to call the righteous, but sinners (Mark 2:17; 5:32) to repentance (Lk 5:32). This is consistent with Horton (2011:577) but adds that Scripture treats repentance as knowledge of sin fashioned by the law (Romans 3:20). Additionally, Strahler (2010:21) quoting (Grudem, 1994:713) observes that conversion illustrates an inward change demonstrated in a life of love and righteousness (Mt. 3:8; Lk.3:10-14). Still, Horton (2011:577) claims that the Spirit is an attorney who convicts inwardly of God’s righteousness and human’s unrighteousness.

Further, Strahler (2010:21-22) uses Jesus’ words in Mt. 18:3 to illustrate this requirement of salvation as perceived in children receiving something as God’s gift of repentance at justification, which is not of human achievements. Justification, argues Frame (2013:966), is forensic, i.e., God declares humans righteous (infused righteousness), which is about humans’ legal status, not an inner character, which means God justifies the ungodly whose inner character is evil, only because of Christ. In other words, as Horton (2011:577) puts it, Christ came to crucify the old self and bury it within himself so that humanity may be raised with him to new life (Romans 6:1-5). Thus about Lk 24:45-47, Wright (2006:30) observes that the mission of declaring repentance and forgiveness to nations in his name is written. This appears to suggest that the scripture finds its fulfillment not only in the life, death, and resurrection of Christ but also in a mission to all nations.

5.2.2.1.3 Christian conversion viewed as faith

Following the preceding discussion of repentance as conversion, the flip-side, faith takes centre stage. Indeed, Horton (2011:580) observes that while in repentance people confess that God’s verdict against humanity is justified, in faith they receive God’s justification. Bosch (1991:216) notes the solemnness of sinful human condition which only God can change because humanity is powerless in the hands of Satan until ransomed by God. Since it required a sinless human-divine to satisfy human guilt and sin before God, Christ’s vicarious death on the cross once and for all judged necessary so that humanity could appropriate benefits of forgiveness, redemption, and renewal by Jesus Christ (Bosch, 1991:216).

Following that, it is vital to conceptualize the word faith. Thus, Strahler (2010:22) observes that in the Hebrew Scriptures, the verb faith אָּמַן (aman) translated as to believe or be faithful, or to accept as a fact (Horton, 2011:580) which means to say amen to works of God upon oneself. Further, Strahler (2010:22) notes that this verb conveys the concept of forthright confidence on someone or something or may designate assent to testimony, the sola fide. However, Burkhardt, 1999:39 & Jepsen, 1977:305 perceives faith as a concept of conversion is lacking in the patriarchal narratives but that of believe is prevalent (Gen.15:6). Thus, as Wright (2006:106) observes prayer and confession, such as the ancient prayer Maranatha! (O Lord, Come) and the primal confession Kyrios iesous (Jesus is Lord) embodied faith.

One of the other Hebrew words used to designate faith is בָּטַח (batach) translated as to trust, feel safe or assent (Strahler, 2010:22; Horton, 2011:580). However, the use of words to trust or committing of oneself designates faith, it does not connote rational belief and is foundational for comprehending conversion (1 Chr 5:20; Ps 22:4; 31:14; Isa 26:3). Thus, argues Strahler (2010:22-23) having faith in the OT signifies full confidence and trust in God’s promises irrespective of the circumstances.

108 God doesn’t justify humanity because he likes their inner character, nor does he like what he has done within them, but justifies them for the sake of Christ (Frame, 2013:966).
The New Testament word for faith is πιστεύω (pisteuo) which is translated to mean either to believe what someone says or to have personal trust as presupposed by the use of a preposition (in) as to believe in the gospel (Mk 1:15) or believe in his name [John 1:12] (Strahler, 2010:23). This position is supported by Horton (2011:581) who asserts that faith is conceptualized as trust or belief in the testimony of another (Philippians 1:27; 2 Cor 4:13; 2 Thess 2:13). Thus, when Jesus told Nicodemus that he must be born again (John 3:3), he meant spiritual birth as a precursor to participating in the kingdom at the end of the age or to experience eternal or resurrected life (Kostenberger, 2004:122). Additionally, Michaels (2010:179) notes that one has to be born from above to perceive the kingdom of God. Besides, Kostenberger (2004:122) observes that Nicodemus could not see (spiritually blind) God's kingdom without a supernatural birth.

Certainly, this nature of faith of believing and trusting in Christ, argues Strahler (2010:23) is necessary for salvation and ushers in the benefits of adoption, the believer's inheritance (Frame, 2013:976). Further, Frame (2013:976-977) observes that it is not through human efforts that entitle humanity to the privilege of sonship but it is given as a gift, reaching out with hands of faith, the blessing of adoption that places the believer in a new family as sons and daughters of God.

Thus, Strahler (2010:23) maintains that the biblical understanding of conversion brings to the fore acceptance of a new set of beliefs that propels change of religious loyalty through repentance and placing one’s faith in the supreme authority, the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This is consistent with Bosch (1991:488) who adds that conversion is not joining a community to secure salvation but a change of allegiance to Christ as Lord and centre of one’s life. This change is prompted by the missional God who not only searches but also sends out to the mission field.

5.2.2.1.4 Missiological appraisal of theology of Christian conversion from Brethren perspective

The two legged conversion concepts of repentance and faith will anchor this segment. Firstly, repentance.

By repentance or confessing of sins by a new believer in the Brethren Fellowship meeting is greeted with verses of Tukutendereza (We praise you Lord) followed with hugging by members of the same sex while opposite sex only shakes hands. It is Brethren's firm belief that hugging the opposite sex is carnal, and suggests loose life and therefore indecorous. Further, a new convert's eligibility or acceptance into the Fellowship is by confessing the past evil deeds before the members (this sets up the neophyte’s future pattern of giving testimony) followed by restitution. On the surface, it resonates with the concept of crucifying the old self by burying it with Christ to be raised with Him in the newness of life (Horton, 2011:577 comments on Romans 6:1-5). However, the tendency to elevate the new birth through outward performances overshadows and compromises the inward change. This practice deters the form of centripetal movement of mission and becomes a challenge to the centrifugal dynamics (Ott et al., 2010:23) because the potential members either understands conversion life differently or are hindered by Brethren’s general theological appropriation of mission strategy.

Secondly, Brethren base its faith in the vicarious death of Christ on the cross for the forgiveness of sins (Bosch, 1991:216). Indeed, a confession that Jesus is Lord! (Kyrios Iesous) appears to sum up their faith (Wright, 2006:106) a declaration that may not seem complete without mentioning the blood of Christ that washed away their sins. This, for Brethren, is the typical appropriation of the saving faith described in their born again testimonies and is, therefore, stereotyped. The apparent stereotyping of the “saving faith” by Brethren appears to disregard justification, which together with adoption are works of God in the believer subsequent to regeneration. However, they seem to confess adoption and sanctification.

While the idea of adoption as a family of God propagated during Brethren Fellowship and Conventions is exemplified by the use of the names, brothers and sisters in Christ, it nevertheless does not consider other Christians as members of that family. But sonship is a gift, which means it is not earned by human efforts (Frame, 2013:976 -977) and this discredits Brethren’s family setup. Thus, as Bosch (1991:488) rightly observes conversion is accepting Christ as Lord and Saviour of one’s life not joining a community. It is this recognition of the Lordship of Christ that would make Brethren participate fully in the mission of God because He is a missional God who searches and sends out to the mission field.

When it comes to sanctification, Brethren gives credence to experiential, which by all standards appear achieved through practical holiness in somewhat pompous manner. Thus it looks ironical and hypocritical that while Brethren seem to exhibit a great salvation experience, they nevertheless seem missio homo. So, when Jesus told Nicodemus that he must be born again (John 3:3) he meant spiritual birth not Pharisaic superficial performance (Kostenberger, 2004:122), a statement that Brethren might need to reconsider if they are to be serious participants in the missio Dei.

5.2.2.2 Missiological theory of theology of Christian worship

King (2000:1034) observes that worship and mission are inseparable because God drives his mission by invitation of worshipers to himself in the light of calls to worship with response strategy of the believers. This resonates with Dawn (1995:76, 80) who adds that it is critical that the church maintains God as both the subject and the object of worship. Thus, this section will look at worship styles from the perspective of God’s call to worship and human response. A particular reference to the current Anglican worship style will tie this section before a critique of Brethren style of worship.

5.2.2.2.1 Christian call to worship

Certainly, God’s call to worship through mission reverberates in the scripture with the first of the Ten Commandments saying, “You shall have no other gods before me” (Ex. 20:3), which means He is entitled to exceptional rectitude shared with none other (Frame, 1996:2). Additionally, Frame (1996:2) notes that God declares Israel to be his people and as their God governs with supreme authority and their response is to honour him above other gods. Thus, King (2000:1034) citing prophet Isaiah 6:1-8 depicts Isaiah heeding the call in the midst of worship. This is consistent with Frame (1996:4) who maintains that God comes to his people in worship as exemplified by encounters in the tabernacle and the temple (Ex 20:24), and worshipers shout with joy that Immanuel, God with us (Isa. 7:14) is in their midst (Zeph. 3:17). Moreover, this God, argues Frame (1996:5) does not abandon his people even when they defile the worship (Gen. 2:16-17; 3:1-6). Additionally, Frame (1996:5) contends that God wants them to worship him with a consciousness of their sin and guilt, on the basis of what he has done to free them from the guilt and power of sin through the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world (John 1:29). No wonder, Wright (2006:81) notes the emphasis in the Hebrew text that there is no other God (1 Sam 2:2; 1Kings 8:60; Joel 2:27) apart from Yahweh, demonstrates adoration and monotheistic worship.

Truly, when Jesus Christ met with the Samaritan woman, he discloses that God is looking for true worshipers who are in a relationship with him (John 4:24). Thus, argues King (2000:1034) the missionary mandate is informed by an intimate relationship with God through worship upon which the people of God join him to call worshipers to himself. So, when Dawn (1995:76) encourages the church to have God as the subject of worship, it signifies that the God revealed in Jesus Christ is everything to a Christian regarding the provision, redemption, sanctification, and Lord. Further, Dawn (1995:76-77) maintains that in as much as the gathered community is important, it is critical to remember that God by his enabling gift of his grace has called Christians - those rescued from themselves through salvation in Jesus Christ – to worship and a life without inversion. In the light of this understanding of the call to worship, King (2000:1034) asserts that God’s call to worship is spread around the world, along with new openness to new forms and patterns of worship, which inform the intimate relationship between worship and mission, in a somewhat worship-propelled mission model.

However, observes Dawn (1995:93), while several defenders of traditional worship styles pride in the historic liturgy, contemporary defenders attempt to control God and convert people by their power, rendering the subsequent arrogance and presupposition to hinder God from being the centre of worship. Hence, while the emphasis on worship style shouldn’t replace the key issue (God as the centre of worship), it is critical to question whether a style conveys the presence and the self-giving of God.

5.2.2.2.2 Christian response to worship

The curse of the fall (Gen. 3:6-10) which is pacified through offering to Yahweh (Gen.4:1-7) argues Hattori (1993:48) is a type of proto-offering response to God. Indeed, when God met with people in the Old Testament the context was one of worship as exemplified by Moses at the burning bush, where he responded by not only removing his shoes because the ground was holy but also by covering his face for fear of God [Ex 3:5, 6] (Frame, 1996:15). Still, argues Frame (1996:16) that when Isaiah saw God (Isa. 6:1f), he was overwhelmed with the greatness of the living God and that he, Isaiah, was a sinner. Therefore, argues Hattori (1993:49) through the covenant of redemption the people of God responded in forms of worship informed by the redemptive-historical and historical-cultural context109. Indeed, Hattori (1993:49) observes the use of different elements of worship at various points in the history of the people of God such as building an altar, offering sacrifice, supplication, praising, among others. So, as Hattori (1993:21) puts it, worship is an active response to God, which is not only participative but is also a context whereby a human declares worthiness of God. Thus, Dawn (1995:81) terms entertainment evangelism mission activity indecorous, as it attracts people rather than adoration of God.

On the other hand, worship in the New Testament illustrates not only engagement with God through faith in Jesus Christ but also for what he has done for humanity (Peterson, 1993:52). Moreover, Peterson (1993:52) states that what is done in church is expected to be consonant with that engagement with God as opposed to a traditional cultic assembly of the congregation at a certain time and place. Thus, meaningful and authentic worship conveys new mission thrust which links worship to the mission. However, Kings (2000:1034) observes that radical separation of worship from mission dominates mission methodologies. Therefore, Piper (2010:35) claims that “missions exist because worship doesn’t,” implying worship should propel missions because it is the fuel and goal of missions. Moreover, Dyrness (2009:6) observes that worship is primary theology, and theology is in essence a secondary reflection of worship life and prayer, which means worship style demonstrates a vital Christian faith.

109 While the redemptive-historical context refers to what God required of his chosen people at this point, the historical-cultural is informed by forms of corporate worship construed admissible and appropriate (Hattori, 1993:49).
Worship in the New Testament is best described by the verb προσκυνέω (proskynein) which articulates bowing down or casting oneself on the ground, kissing feet, as a physical gesticulation of reverence before a supreme being, which is Hebrew histawah that occurs 170 times in the Hebrew Bible and translates as bend oneself over at the waist (Peterson, 1993:52-53). This is in agreement with Bosch (1991:75) who translates the verb to worship in a stronger sense as to fall prostrate as depicted by the disciples (in the context of the Great Commission) when they saw Jesus, “they worshipped him” (Mt. 28:17). Thus, bending over to the Lord or [falling prostrate], in the Old Testament, argues Peterson (1993:53), expressed surrender or submission to God. Thus, Jesus’ encounter with Satan in the wilderness upholds the Old Testament teaching that the response demanded by God is submission and service to him alone [Mt 4:8-10; Lk 4:5-8] (Peterson, 1993:54-55). This is what King (2000:1034) seems to call meaningful worship which is distinctive because worship must remain worship, must allow God to renew his original creation, and must pursue diversity within the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12; Eph. 2).

The tension between traditional and contemporary styles confronts Dawn’s (1995:93) proposition that God is the subject and object of worship. However, it is the platform of tradition and reformation that dialectical tension would ensure Godly worship as revealed in the scriptures and the person of Christ (Dawn, 1995:93). Thus, Dawn (1995:97) recalls Martin Luther explication of the Ten Commandments which begin with the phrase, “we should fear and love God…” since the human relationship with God is dialectic and alienation from him evokes fear, he nevertheless, graciously invites his people to respond in love.

Stancliffe (1991:126), states that Anglican liturgy is comprehensive and aims at directing God’s people to the very throne of God himself. However, while Beckwith (1993:126) notices that profound Scriptural content and expressive style of Cranmer’s 1662 BCP apparently abandoned as starting point on liturgical revisions in favour of patristic models, doctrinal clarity in congregational participation is lacking. However, argues Beckwith (126-127), some Anglican Churches like that of Australia have tried to keep the doctrine of the existing liturgy in their modernization of Prayer Book services, while others in reaction to strict rubrics have allowed for lax ones putting liturgical worship in danger of giving way to impromptu worship.

In Kenya the 1662 BCP like in many other provinces in the Anglican Communion, though exceedingly useful, has culturally become redundant, thus, the Anglican Church of Kenya [ACK] (2003: vii) has put together a new Prayer Book, Our Modern Services which has taken excellent account of the worship needs for the Anglican Christians in Kenya today. But, although lauded by the former Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey to an extent of requesting it be made available to other provinces in Africa to motivate liturgical renewal efforts (ACK, 2003:viii), it nevertheless appears to have more Old Testament sentences of Scripture that address the human response to the God’s call to worship than to God as the subject of worship (ACK, 2003: 1-2). This resonates with the BCP of 1662 of the Church of England 1662 (1668:1-2) and Prayer Book of the Church of England in South Africa (1992:1-2). This feature might suggest that the Old Testament has a more balanced perspective of God as both the subject and object of worship than the New Testament, a fact that might be true considering various offerings and sacrifices associated with the Old Testament worship patterns.

Brethren’s Fellowship meetings revolve around worship and thus agree with King (2000:1034) and Frame (1996:4) that God comes to his people in worship. However, the tendency to hearken to God’s intimate call to worship for all Christians as epitomized in Mt 11:28-30, appears inconsistent with the perceived commonly held legacy of Brethren as carriers of other people’s burden. Indeed, Brethren appear only interested in bringing to their fold the ones who profess born again testimony while other Christians are left out. The primary distinctiveness of Israelites, argues Wright (2006:381) was their exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. But while Israelites were admonished to separate themselves from people of other nations who worshipped other gods, Brethren apparently separate themselves from worship with their fellow Christians only because they don’t give a conversion testimony, observe practical holiness of walking in the light, and attend fellowship meetings.

Conversely, God does not abandon his people as explicated by Jesus’ encounter with a Samaritan woman (John 4:7ff), we are all sinners saved by his grace, and no one is perfect (Frame, 1996:5). Indeed, Brethren format of giving testimony does not prove one is saved, actions do. So when Brethren despise other Christians by claiming they are not born again, they fall to the sin of sanctimoniousness. This attempt to control God as to convert and sanctify other Christians by their power appears vanity. Certainly, the missionary mandate would call upon Brethren to join God to call other Christian worshipers to himself (King, 2000:1034) because as Dawn (1995:76-77) argues there is a need to rescue self-righteous believers from a hypocritical worship.

Surely, Brethren’s brokenness concept at the cross of Christ ought to lead them to the conviction of sin, confession and restitution (Church of the Province of Kenya, 1994:81) which would have paved the way for acceptance of other believers into the fellowship. Honestly, if the encounter with God overwhelms a sinner, Brethren ought to view themselves as guilty of the sin of exclusion by barring other Christians from becoming Brethren (Frame, 1996:16).
Brethren appear to have turned Revival Fellowship into a place of stereotyping worship instead of a place to engage with God (Peterson, 1993:52) because real worship should link to the mission, and not separate worship from the mission (Kings, 2000:1034). It should encourage Brethren to respond to God by daily sanctification which is missional and invitational as to avoid blocking the kingdom seekers from entering the kingdom of God.

Having said that, liturgical renewal, for example in the ACK has taken excellent account of the needs of the Anglican Christians in Kenya though it appears more responsive to the call to worship than listening to the call of God. While this tendency is rooted in the BCP of 1662, it is pivotal to craft a liturgy that seeks to balance God as the subject and object of worship taking cognizance of public participation that is not just evangelistic entertainment but entrenched a genuine worship of God. Otherwise, it appears to buttress Brethren response to the call more than listening to God. Thus Brethren liturgical worship has largely been reclusive rather than being directed to the worship of God.

5.2.2.3 Missiological theory of theology of social ethics

Ethics of social theology have been associated with consequences of conversion which as Strahler (2010:23) notes affect the whole life, whereby, new sets of beliefs and change of loyalty to Christ is expected. In other words, argues Bosch (1991:107), conversion or salvation experience is not only expressed vertically as to depict love to God but also horizontally as to illustrate love to neighbour. This is further elaborated by the born again experience informed by the gift of God at justification which leads not only to a change of individual consciousness and social belonging but also to a changed mental attitude and physical experience (Strahler, 2010:17, 23). Having said that, a consideration of the salvation life of the converted person will hinge missiological theology of social ethics from the perspective of Christian’s moral life in general and Christian family moral values in particular.

5.2.2.3.1 Christian’s moral life

Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:118) states that God’s character and nature are not only at the core of Christian theological and social ethics, but also models the moral life through ethical-actions’ full value systems like justice, solidarity, and hospitality. This resonates with Zacchaeus announcement (Lk 19:8) to give back, which Bock (1996:1520-21) claims signifies expression of a thanks offering of a changed heart, and by any standard is generous to the poor unlike the rich ruler (Lk 18:23) who appeared less inclined to charitable actions. While Green (1997:672) observes that Zacchaeus’ conversion episode is outside the narrative, he, however, applauds his generosity to the service of the needy and of justice. Thus, Ott et al. (2010:145) maintain that the Lord loves righteousness and justice (Ps 11:7), which is further implied in the Law of Moses which illustrates protection of the poor, the widow, the orphan and the alien (Exod. 23:1-9). Indeed, Hastings (2012:149) asserts since the mission is holistic, to do evangelism without caring for the poor and improving social infrastructure is inconceivable. Certainly, Ott et al., (2010:129) observes that Evangelicals excluded the social gospel for church and mission until 1928 when the IMC declared that the proclamation of the gospel and services of human needs are authentic and essential segments of the church’s responsibility.

In other words, contends Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:120), the Christians’ relationship with the Triune God has implications on the daily moral life following changed Christians’ nature and its power over sin as a result of benefits of God’s grace of adoption, which enables Christians to please God. In addition, Wright (2006:389) contends that the quality of Christians’ moral lives, like the way Israel had been intended (but failed), should be visible to the nations so that nations can glorify God. Truly, Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:121-122) claims that, to defeat an ethical system based on human effort, believers ought to walk in the Spirit (Rom. 8:4) by crucifying the flesh daily through the enabling power of the Spirit (Rom. 8:13). However, Hastings (2012:149) observes that when people claim to be born of the Holy Spirit and turns their backs on the needy in the society, it raises a fundamental question regarding their born again status.

Ott et al. (2010:7,150) observe the term families which translates the Hebrew mishpaha does not only illustrate blessings through Abraham to all families of the earth but is also a vital social structure for procreation and people relations. But sometimes social and legal structures for the sanctity of human life are undermined as exemplified by the Pharaoh state-sponsored genocide, which led Israelites to suffer the extreme violence of fundamental human rights (Ex.2:1-2) that brought terror and grief to the families (Wright, 2006:269).

Nevertheless, since Jesus’ ethics emphasized family moral values, Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:95) notes that Christians as members of God’s family through repentance and faith, receives God's grace and forgiveness and by this new birth they become God's children (John 1:12-13). However, Strahler (2010:81) claims that, though this new birth is sometimes met with physical violence and breakdown in the family relationship, it sometimes improves and even wins the entire family to Christ. The concept of belonging to God's family, says Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:95) has ethical insinuations for social life in which brothers and sisters (Matt 22:37-40) not only love and treat one another with respect but also forgive each other (Matt 18:21-35).
5.2.2.3.3 Missiological appraisal of theology of social ethics from Brethren perspective

Brethren have been accused of dissociating themselves from social and economic activities like merry-go-round/welfare groups for fear of either being considered wealthy with material things which could lead to sin. This seems to resonate with Kupaa Brethren’s influence associated with the literal interpretation of Daniel 1:8-15, which emphasizes simple lifestyle away from the king’s polluted diet. Thus, Brethren construes as unethical anything that can jeopardize their maxim of walking in the light. Nonetheless, as Hastings (2012:149) insinuates, the mission is holistic and constitutes not only evangelism but also social action. Although, the majority Brethren are subsistence farmers and thus not wealthy, working together with other Christians to improve the lives of the very disenfranchised in the society is a noble Christian duty (1John 3:17-18). Indeed, Brethren appear more inclined to evangelism and social activities within themselves for themselves but not with other Christians (the Lord’s Bag, mentioned earlier). Truly, in this respect, Brethren’s social and ethical lives appear to be based on human effort rather than what Paul terms walk in the Spirit (Rom.8:4).

The concept of the family seems enshrined within Brethren ethical structure so much that, they refer to one another as brothers and sisters in Christ. This idea of belonging to God’s family is critical for Christian moral life because it is not only biblically based but also provides a platform on which values of forgiveness and love are upheld (Nkansah-Obrempong, 2013:95). Indeed, the ethical response to believers calling into God’s family is not just to please God, but also the outsiders (Wright, 2006:387). In other words, however much Brethren would wish to maintain its social-ethical codes of walking in the light it should be mindful of other Christians, who due to strict moral codes have shied away from the Revival Fellowship family.

5.2.3 Anthropological perspective of missiology on Brethren beliefs and practices of walking in the light

Anthropology, argues Kraft (1996:2) has not been a part of Christian institutions curricula as it has been branded anti-Christian which Kraft (2000:67) observes as the overextension of evolutionary and ethical relativism. Indeed, Kraft (2000:67) perceives that missiological anthropology has sometimes followed the fashions of secular anthropology, in good faith, to access and understand particular anthropological insights like internal workings of cultures, cultural change dynamics, and the necessity of a worldview.

\[110\] In ancient days cultural anthropology had been dominated by physical anthropology such as study of human fossils and the evolution of man, on the one hand, and study of primitive cultures, on the other hand (Smalley, 1974:8).
This is consistent with Smalley (1974:3) who contends that cultural anthropology is gaining relevance in the curricula of prospective missionaries and enabling significance impact in Christian ministry. Certainly, Kraft (2000:67) notes real insights of anthropology on Christian witness, on the one hand, a two-way influence between missiological anthropology and Bible translation, and on the other hand, influences of the cultural communication process, contextualization of Christianity and the worldview. Additionally, Kraft (1996:xiv) understands anthropology from the perspectives of Christian ministry, in which people are not only culturally formed and constrained, but also respond to God from the viewpoints of their way of life (Mk 16:15). It is within this cultural milieu that Christianity confronts culture with a radical call to change loyalty (conversion) to the Lordship of Jesus Christ.

5.2.3.1 Missiological theory of anthropology of Christian conversion

Hiebert (2008:11) contends that conversion to Christ encompasses behaviour, beliefs, and worldview. While Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization [LCWE] (1981:523-524) concurs with Hiebert’s description of conversion informed by changes in behaviour and worldview, it nevertheless appears to substitute beliefs with relationships. Indeed, Strahler (2010:79-83) depicts the idea of conversion as a new relationship with internal (self) and external (community) ramifications for the convert. Thus, the relationship seems to be a key missiological anthropological concept that overshadows conversion lifestyle. It thus appears that Hiebert, LCWE, and Strahler have similar perspectives of what comprises conversion within a cultural milieu of beliefs, and worldview (behaviour and relationship) which will form the conceptual framework to debunk EARM’s beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

5.2.3.1.1 Christian conversion viewed as a new mind/belief

Conversion, argues Hiebert (2008:11) must not only transform personal and corporate traditional beliefs but should also reflect the change of mind because people could interpret it as a more powerful magic to harm enemies (Acts 8:14-24) resulting in syncretism, a common danger in the church. Indeed, one can become a Christian after preaching the gospel, but more time is required to nurture the convert to avoid what Hiebert (1994:108) terms cheap grace and a consequent nominal church. Truly, Karanja (2012:150) claims that at Mutira in Kirinyaga County, central Kenya, a local chief requested Herbert Butcher, the resident missionary to pray for rain following a severe famine in 1921. The Missionary obliged and prayer was instantly answered leading to people converting to Christianity including prominent medicine men who now viewed Butcher as a superior medicine man (Karanja, 2012:150). This seemingly partial conversion could be deceiving and would require spiritual guidance to effect the real conversion.
Actually, Hibbert (2015:69), arguing from Tippet’s conversion model of Hindus and Muslims, observes that conversion is a multistage dynamic process that requires a period of identity negotiation in the conversion process. Additionally, Isichei (1995:122) contends that productive dialogues between Christianity and African traditional religions informed by visual symbolisms as well as religious considerations should follow. Such dialogues were prevalent in the Gikuyu traditional culture of Kenya which emphasized confession as a mark of conversion, whereby a gutahikio (symbolic vomiting) ritual was carried out and the person made to confess through a symbolical vomit of misdeeds of known and unknown sin (Karanja, 2012:147-148). As Karanja (2012:148) rightly observes the church’s teaching on confession is grounded in Scripture (James 5:16; 1 John 1:9) and thus Gikuyu concept of ritual cleansing through confession of evil provides a link with Christian faith.

Thus, LCWE (1981:522) appears to contrast the contemporary church with the New Testament on the radical nature of conversion to Jesus Christ. While the former seems to trivialize it, the latter depicts it as the outward expression of regeneration by God’s spirit, a new creation, and a resurrection. The concept of resurrection argues LCWE (1981:522) brings to the fore the eschatological dimension of Christian conversion, which God has begun and will be brought to completion when Christ comes in his glory. Nevertheless, Nkansah-Obrempong (2013:123) warns against the emphasis on the over-realized eschatology (1 Cor.4:8) a problem Paul had to arrest in the Corinthian church.

5.2.3.1.2 Christian conversion as a new way of life/worldview

A worldview is the most important and incorporating view of reality shared by people of one culture, which Hiebert (2008:84) calls the mental picture of reality or the givens of life that help comprehend the surrounding world. Thus, Hiebert (2008:84) further avers, “to question worldview is to challenge the very foundation of life, and people resist such challenges with deep emotional reactions. There are few human fears greater than a loss of a sense of order and meaning. People are willing to die for their beliefs if these beliefs make their death meaningful”.

Following this, while making certain statements about the essence of the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1-9) and the spiritual need of a sinner (Rom.3:9-18), the delivery of these truths’ precise locations involves a contextualization process (Hesselgrave, 1981:405). For instance, Kraft (1996:366) reflecting on cultural and worldview change, notes that the process of change works as the process of persistence, in which, the participants in a society attempt to maintain its past alignment and configuration, while at the same time, continually changing old methods and creating new ones.
Therefore, whereas conversion symbolizes death to the past, conceptualized as being crucified with Christ, dying to godlessness and putting off the old Adam, LCWE (1981:522-23) maintains that it may involve painful sacrifices (Lk 14:25ff). Indeed, Hiebert (1994:165) argues that emphasis on personal conversion re-creates severing relationships with the old life and embracing the new with the significant cost of leaving the familiar life for a new one. Therefore, Kraft (1996:11) argues that Christian anthropologists are particularly concerned about worldview because whenever a conversion is made it will affect people’s worldview regarding assumptions, values, and allegiances.

5.2.3.1.3 Missiological appraisal of anthropology of Christian conversion from Brethren’s perspective

Brethren appear to demonstrate a low opinion of traditional cultural beliefs as reflected in the way they handle the conversion to Christianity. Certainly, their concern is not just mere conversion, but a change of belief achieved in the born again testimony, which depicts a pilgrim’s progress from the old-self to the new-self, described as putting off the old Adam and putting on Christ, often at a price (LCWE, 1981:522-23). The converts are not only compelled to confess their evil past (in the Fellowship meetings) but also expected to change allegiance from traditional beliefs to Christ. The indoctrination is so critical to Brethren that the new convert is supposed to join Gatia-Uki (local Fellowship) to commence the instruction process to avoid what Hiebert (1994:108) terms cheap grace. Indeed, Brethren are right to avoid cheap grace, but their insistence on experiential sanctification mostly ends up in stereotype and hypocritical worldview expressed through practical holiness, somewhat tantamount to over-realized eschatology (Nkansah-Obrempong, 2013:123). This worldview worries missiological anthropologists because the newly acquired values tend to drive Brethren away from the community and sometimes from family members (Kraft, 1996:11).

Indeed, the change is more of enculturation than inculturation. The new Brethren Worldview appears to dictate neophytes’ new beliefs and practices instead of following a critical contextualization process, which, while it contextualizes the gospel, it remains prophetic (Hiebert, 1994:84-86). The lack of a critical process appears to hinder appropriate adaptation and application of the gospel, because God’s truth ought to be faithfully and intelligently communicated through the Spirit (Hesselgrave, 1981:408) in all cultures, including that of Brethren. Certainly, Brethren’s contextualization principles compare with old Christian missionaries who sought to replace paganism with western Christianity termed as tabula rasa (Ott et al. 2015:50).
5.2.3.2 Missiological theory of anthropology of Christian worship

5.2.3.2.1 Christian worship as acquired belief

Hastings (2012:137) claims that the assembled worship of the church must embody both change and continuity, whereas, the change reflects required inculturation to contextualize and communicate the gospel; continuity is derived from apostolic faith and developed by the specialists of the church. Indeed, Smalley (1974:110) while planting the church in Alaska, attests to the fact that superstitions still exists undercover, as natives would not disclose to a white person beliefs in supernatural powers, though such information leaks to worshipers in church on Sunday mornings. Isichei (1995:6) illustrates this further by observing that traditional beliefs and Christian beliefs sometimes exist parallel in one person as exemplified by the Nigerian radical, Tai Solarin who points out that his mother while in danger, would call on the spirit of her grandfather more than Jesus. In Kenya, argues Karanja (2012: 148-89), the pioneer missionaries preached on the doctrine of original sin, which led to a sense of guilt among the Christians - as to seek services of traditional diviners to deal with illness or personal tragedy - as demonstrated by one of the pioneer African ministers in Nairobi who wore protective charms. This is consistent with Kraft’s (1996:201) concept of dual allegiance (described as the biggest problem in global Christianity) which illustrates those who pledge loyalty to both Christ and traditional powers, such as medicine men and diviners.

Thus, some indigenous churches’ movements in Africa find outlets for religious expressions by hand-clapping and dancing and perceive the western form of worship in many mission churches as unnatural (Smalley, 1974:159). Nevertheless, Hastings (2012:177) contends that church as a community that is both lively and old ought to express worship that is not only living and exciting but depicts continuity with redemption history and liturgy. Thus, one of the prayers of intercession for the lives of those who have departed in Christ, in Our Modern Services Prayer Book of the Anglican Church of Kenya (2003: 77) says; “Gracious Father, we heartily thank you for our faithful ancestors and all who have passed through death to the new life of joy in our heavenly home. We pray that surrounded by so great a cloud of witnesses; we may walk in their footsteps and fully united with them in your everlasting kingdom.” In other words, it is not all ancestors, but those who died in Christ, whose mentorship inspired and motivated Christocentric life. So, Hastings (2012:146) further asserts that Christocentric missional church can achieve both incarnational width and spiritual depth through cultural relevance and engagement on the one hand, and on the other hand, confessional and ecclesial.
5.2.3.2.2 Christian worship as acquired worldview

Kraft (1996:210) believes God is pro-culture as he worked with the culture of Hebrews, including their religion, except idolatry. Thus Kraft decries Christians who tramples down traditional religion of the people they have come to win to Christ, which ends up condemning their worldview. Thus, Abrecht and Smalley (1974:123) observe that God appears to work with the dominant forms of culture more than missionaries would like to acknowledge, rendering them alien to the local community. Consequently, Abrecht and Smalley (1974:123) are of the view that for the missionary to lead the local community to total commitment to Christ, he should motivate the people to find appropriate structures to express their new faith within their culture. This resonates with Zaki’s (2014:17) observation that worship reflects local cultural characteristics and the fact that Jesus’ incarnated in a distinct culture gives both a model and a mandate, for the gospel was never cultural specific, rather, the good news was to extend to the entire world positioning the church deeply into various local cultures.

Further, Zaki (2014:17-18) outlines two critical approaches to contextualization of a viable worldview. At the one end of the continuum is the dynamic equivalence—which tend to re-state Christian worship dynamics with an appropriate local culture component, such as modelling the lordship of Jesus among “the Masai tribe in Kenya by painting a black man dressed in a red robe, since red is the colour of royalty and is always worn by the village chief”. On the other end of the continuum is creative assimilation, which means enriching worship by adding relevant components of local culture, as in Egypt where an oud (lute) harmonic sound is used to add a fuller expression to psalms of lament.

Truly, dynamic equivalence approach is further exemplified in the Anglican Church of Kenya (2003:84) service of Holy Communion whereby Turkana of Kenya tradition of casting away of sins to the setting sun is expressed in the Anglican Holy communion service with a sweep of the arm towards the cross - to symbolize casting way of problems, difficulties and the devils’ works - to the cross of Christ, and hopes, on the risen Christ. Furthermore, Nyimbo Cia Gucanjamura Ngoro (Gikuyu hymn of praise) published by the Anglican Church of Kenya captures creative assimilation of African musical-styled rhythms that has not only revitalized the African feel of Christian music but has also brought jubilation to the worship due to artistic identity with culture.

Thus, Sesi (2009:200-201) writing on contextualization of prayer and worship among the Digo Christians in Kenya observes that contextualization would enable them to devise and nurture Christian dynamics that not only make sense to them but also match their worldview. Nevertheless, Zaki (2014:18) notes that, while it challenges anthropological missiologists to become careful readers of culture in light of biblical truths, Christian worship must resist the idolatries of a given culture that contradicts the gospel.
5.2.3.2.3 Missiological appraisal of anthropology of Christian worship from Brethren’s perspective

When Brethren use the analogy uprooted (as of dug up) carrot to describe a change of allegiance from the traditional cultural beliefs they are essentially declaring change with discontinuity with all cultural beliefs. This drastic change in belief achieved through a born again philosophy and expressed through selected worship style defines Brethren’s worldview of Christian worship. This is in spite of the Anglican Church of Kenya (2003: 77) thanksgiving prayer to God for the lives of those who have departed in Christ which not only incorporates faithful ancestors but embodies both change and continuity (Hastings, 2012:137), and is consistent with Kraft (1996:210) who believes God is pro-culture.

From this perspective, it appears like Brethren worldview of worship is informed by inadequate biblical and theological understanding of anthropological missiology, which as Zaki (2014:17) observes ought to reflect components of local culture. Indeed, since Jesus’s incarnation was in a particular culture and appears to work with existing cultures contradicts Brethren’s worldview (Abrecht and Smalley, 1974:123) and suggests a worship style modeled and mandated by Jesus’ view of cultures. For Brethren to have an effective mission, it ought not only to have appropriate dynamic equivalent cultural components but also have them creatively contextualized in their fellowship meetings.

Nevertheless, Brethren lethargy against culture should not be wholly tramped down because as Zaki (2014:18) observes cultural elements (idolatries) that contradict gospel in Christian worship is rejected. Either way, an informed contextualization is required for Brethren to participate fully in the mission of God within their local communities where sometimes complexities of dual allegiance to Christ and cultural beliefs exist parallel in one person (Isichei, 1995:6). Admittedly, the concept of dual allegiance not only appears to dishonour the second commandment (Exodus 20:3) but is likely to influence Brethren private worship (opposed to dynamic equivalent and creative assimilation), unless informed structures are put in place to facilitate a responsible and viable process of change and continuity.

5.2.3.3 Missiological theory of anthropology of social ethics

In the 19th century missions, argues Hiebert (2008:10), many missionaries looked for evidence of conversion to Christ through outward features like putting on clothes and giving up alcohol but did not change underlying beliefs. Indeed, people changed behaviours to win status or get jobs, until the 20th century when transformations in people’s views took centre stage with missions setting up Bible schools and seminaries to teach the orthodox doctrine of Christian conversion (Hiebert, 2008:11). Thus, Kraft (1996:440) describes transformational culture change as that which takes place in a society and its culture because of change in worldview. With that in mind, a worldview informed social, ethical beliefs and practices would hinge this segment.

5.2.3.3.1 Christian social-ethical life as individual beliefs and practices

A focus by anthropologists on the relationship of an individual and culture appears to have arisen from the belief that people are conceived without culture but soon find themselves encultured and socialized to a particular way of seeing reality, thinking and behaving (Kraft, 1996:150). One of the profound theories of an individual, appears to resonate with what Mbiti (1969:106) conceptualizes as “I am, because we are; and since we are, therefore I am,” which depicts an individual as social being because it is “only in terms of other people does the individual become conscious of his being…responsibilities towards himself and towards other people”. This concept argues Knoetze (2017:1) does not only associate African identity with Ubuntu principle111, but also with Biblical humanity and discipleship perspectives of “I am and you are, because he (God) is”. Moreover, contends Knoetze (2017:1), this viewpoint negates individualistic understanding expounded by Descartes, “I think therefore I am”, which is especially prevalent in modern South Africa.

Admittedly, like Kraft (1996:150) notes enculturation is so effective that individual behaviour is affected by cultural conditioning in all perspectives. Nonetheless, as Grimes and Grimes (1974:199) observe some cultures like the Huichol Indians in Mexico are distinctly individualistic [rather differently from Mbiti’s and Ubuntu’s concept] in the sense that they depict full cultural limits of acceptable variation, and consequently a low predictableness of specific actions. Indeed an attempt was made to introduce congregational singing as happens in many Christian communities as a way to unify Christians but was met with resistance, and so they continued with their pattern of having one person sing112 in all gathering of Christians (Grimes and Grimes, 1974:202).

While Mbiti’s and Grimes’ description of an individual relationship with culture posit differing cultural conditioning, it appears the latter would have made it easier for an individual approach to Christianization [cf. Descartes sentiments] than the former. This echoes Baur (1994:94) who claims that the missionary method aimed at the individual salvation of souls as opposed to the communal concept of religion among the African peoples. Consequently, Christian rites were assimilated by the African religion. Nevertheless, the individual approach, concerning later 111 “I am only because we are, and since we are, therefore I am” (Du Toit, 2004:33).

112 “One difficulty with congregational singing was that with no set form for the order of lines in a stanza and much repetition no one knew how anyone else was going to sing the same song” (Grimes and Grimes, 1974:202) missionary Christianization efforts broke through the individual concept of the whole to form what Hiebert (1994:115) calls Christian as a bounded set or what Hastings (2012:122) refers to the Christocentric community in which Christ is the centre. Indeed African communal aspect appears to assume a new dimension of discipleship from the perspective of the Ubuntu principle of African identity in which God is the focus.

Indeed African culture initiation rituals appear to reinforce bounded set analogy. For example, Mbti (1969:120) notes that the belief of shedding of blood into the ground during circumcision mystically bound the initiate with the living-dead (symbolically living in the ground) symbolizes new birth and new age-set. Certainly, such kind of beliefs motivated early missionaries to forbid initiation rites, a fact that Hiebert and Meneses (1995:180) observes was precipitated by among others, pagan components in the ritual and tendency to equate it with baptism, instead of a ritual in which a Christian publicly declare transition to social and religious adulthood. Hiebert and Meneses (1995:181) further argue that the traditional morality that connected individuals to the family, clan, and tribe is disappearing, as traditional beliefs and values are rejected as false myths.

5.2.3.3.2 Christian social-ethical life as communal beliefs and practices

Hiebert and Meneses (1995:180-181) highlight modernity as a source of the same crisis that has led to the collapse of old ways of life and consequently schizophrenic cultural beliefs. Indeed, Langley and Kiggins (1974:159) contend that the ritual symbolism of initiation rites was so profoundly expressive and meaningful that the anthropologists encultured it as a means of passing on to the next generation the themes of culture such as friendly relations, endurance, responsibility and orderliness in society. Further, Langley and Kiggins (1974:161) reflect on an Anglican missionary who worked towards Christianizing initiation rites among Masasi of Tanzania by retaining initiation components that inform communal identity while removing what he termed obscene or immoral aspects.

About the above, Hastings (2012:164) argues for a contextualization which encompasses engagement with culture or what he calls inculturation without enculturation, which does not only have an incarnational mandate but a communal dimension of culture. However, Phiri (2009:76) points out that since an African community’s collective decisions for change involves the entire society understanding the need for a change. Certainly, Kraft (1996:388) asserts that people have to be interested not only in need but also in the solution stimulated by the practical 113 One of the ways of classifying a person as a Christian argues Hiebert (1994:115) is by test of orthodoxy and orthopraxy (right behaviour), with a verbal affirmations of belief in a specific set of doctrines, such as the deity of Christ and the virgin birth, and evidences of faith in the changed lives of the Christian, such as does not smoke or drink alcohol, respectively.

need of change, as opposed to a theoretical explanation of the value of the Christian way of life. As noted earlier, for instance, argues Karanja (2012:150) when the traditional rituals failed to bring down the rain following a prolonged drought that threatened animal and human life, the local chief approached Herbert Butcher (the resident missionary at CMS station) to pray for rains. Butcher prayed, and heavy rain ensued immediately, encouraging not only the local diviners to renounce their practice and give up their divining paraphernalia for burning, but hundreds of people flocked into Mutira mission (Karanja, 2012:150).

5.2.3.3.3 Missiological appraisal of anthropology of Christian social ethic from Brethren’s perspective

Brethren’s social, ethical life revolves around briefs and practices encultured and nurtured in Brethren Fellowships. While Brethren’s beliefs in individual membership perpetuated through personal born again testimony and achieved through certain moral codes, they certainly value community awareness of the individual conceptualized by the exclusive nature of their spirituality tantamount to a bounded set of Christian phenomena (Hiebert, 1994:115) that desist evil practices. Nevertheless, Brethren are quick to inculturate some African cultural elements, which could boost missiological anthropology mission perspectives of African Christians who practice circumcision. One of the Brethren’s fundamentals is the beliefs and practices that set apart a Christian from the old nature. Although they don’t equate it to baptism, Brethren view circumcision as a symbol of marking the end of old life which echoes African puberty rites of passage.

This resonates with Karanja’s (2012:146) observation of a young man at St Paul’s United Theological College, today’s St Paul’s University, who was jubilant that his fellow students (members of Brethren) had facilitated his circumcision so that he could reconcile his Christian faith with cultural practices of his people. This further reverberates with Langley and Kiggins’ (1974:161) reflection of an Anglican [anthropological] missionary who Christianized useful components of initiation rites among Masasi of Tanzania as a way of fostering communal identity. This rings alarm bells to Brethren who expect a converted person to demonstrate clear characteristics of the new life in the same way a circumcised person is supposed to depict maturity and responsibility. This identity formation unfortunately fostered ethical codes of conduct within Brethren, yet if well guided to ensure freedom with responsibility could surely motivate an informed Brethren anthropological mission.

Another aspect to note about Brethren is that their beliefs and practices are communally enacted to hedge their independent lifestyle. Although change is inevitable if Brethren Fellowship is to make a mark in the anthropological mission, there seems to be no general agreement across the board on what aspects need change. While some are still hesitant on hairdos, others have somewhat allowed their young members to wear a wig. This lack of unanimity on change illustrates the sensitive nature of collective decisions especially when the decision is perceived to bring loss rather than gain (Phiri, 2009:76). Nonetheless, when understood that it would add value to the Brethren community, it will be accommodated (Karanja, 2012:150), and will no doubt translate their social, ethical beliefs and practices from being a hindrance to the anthropological mission to faithful participants in the mission of God.

5.3 SUMMARY OF THE PREVAILING SITUATION AS IT IS TODAY USING HISTORICAL AND EMPIRICAL ANALYSES.

To dispense with the current situation, a consideration of thematic harmony regarding the historical epochs and the empirical situation of the present trend are put into their respective viewpoints as demonstrated in chapter 3.

On the one hand, the historical survey came up with six descriptive themes which seem to inform the heritage of Keswick theology on the EARM’s socio-ethical life from 1935 to 2015. These themes are a baptism of the Spirit, born again, Cross of Christ/daily victory, public confession of sins, filling of the Spirit, and authority of the Scripture. On the other hand, also clustered into six key themes are the findings and analyses of nature and current trends regarding Anglicanism church scholarship today. These are, Brethren’s born again testimony, acquaintances with EARM’s precursor, the daily sanctification of the new man, Scripture and moral code, effects of splits on a mission of the Anglican Church and synergized-diversified Anglican Church. Most of these themes encompassed a lot of generic information that made it necessary to generate subthemes.

That notwithstanding, the apparent thematic consistencies between the historical survey and the current trends appear to suggest some heritage of Keswick theology. This is in spite of the fact that majority of the respondents could not trace EARM's antecedent. Indeed, except for themes on the baptism of the Holy Spirit which seem to have disappeared, others find affinity either in the major themes or subthemes of the current data findings. The table 6 below seeks to elucidate a possible scenario of the influence of Keswick theology on the prevailing socio-ethical trend of walking in the light.

While the historical theme of born again easily pervades the Brethren born again testimony, public confession of sin and daily victory finds an affinity to some of the sub-themes of the Brethren born again testimony like confession and the journey with Jesus respectively. This historic theme also appears to attract a current trend theme of the daily sanctification of the new man. Admittedly, this current trend theme seems to place experiential sanctification of everyday life into both Keswick and non-Keswick backgrounds.

Whereas the historical theme of filling with the Spirit finds kinship in various current situation themes like subthemes of worship in Spirit dynamics and Pentecostal haven, it also flickers in the current theme of the daily sanctification of the new man.

Concerning the authority of Scripture, this has been one of the themes that have consistently informed the history of the EARM, whereby members appear to conceive the idea that immediate scriptural contexts have the inherent authority of its own apart from wider contexts. Indeed some moral codes that inform the current socio-ethics seem to have sprung from literal interpretation and application of various biblical texts.

Finally, the theme on acquaintances with EARM’s precursor appears to lack affinity with a historical theme. This could be attributed to the fact that it was to do with knowledge of Keswick theology which was not a concern of the historical survey.
Following this, it is pivotal from the viewpoint of the current trend, to acknowledge the fact that, despite the alleged fears that accompany EARM’s socio-ethics, it has nevertheless shown a resilient lifestyle, exemplified by the number of subthemes associated with the principal themes. However, the majority of historical themes only fitted on a small proportion of the key themes which suggest a diminishing significance.

Having said that, to summarize the prevailing situation as it is today, it is critical to put the harmonized themes (current trends) into manageable clusters of conversion, worship style, and moral codes. Indeed, this triad forms the legs upon which analytical summary of the current historical and empirical situation hinges. Thus, the conversion theme incorporates born again and daily sanctification; worship style comprises worship dynamics and Pentecostalism; while scriptures inform moral codes.

5.3.1 Historical analysis

In order to put the historical analysis of the prevailing trend into its proper perspective, a summary of the historical trends is placed within the framework of themes of conversion, worship style, and moral codes.

5.3.1.1 Conversion

Brethren’s concept of the new birth impacted Kenyan soil immediately following a visit by a team from Rwanda in 1937 (Church, 1981:145; Macmaster and Jacobs, 2006:58), which led to factions (Joremo and Johera) among the revivalists in the Anglican Church in the western Kenya (Wellborn and Ogot, 1966:31,32). While both Joremo (Wahamaji) and Johera claimed daily sanctification and self-righteousness, the former asserted one could be saved many times, while the latter affirmed salvation takes place once, with a provision for backsliding and restoration (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:34,35,38). This pompous disposition elevated these factions above other believers, creating a two Christian scenario.

Indeed, Brethren’s sanctimonious display of the achieving cleansing blood of Christ is illustrated by the apolitical disposition during the state of emergency (1952-1960), and the post-election violence of 2007 (Gatu, 2012:39). Furthermore, Mambo (1973:111-12) observes Brethren tribulations from both the church leadership and the African traditions over the open confession of sin and constant claim to have been born again. Indeed, the concept of a new birth was misunderstood among the Gikuyu Christians who accused Brethren of reintroducing the traditional rite of guciaruo ringi (Mambo, 1973:112) and as heretics, were denied fellowship in churches. Moreover, confessions of sins, especially of adultery, cost a bishop his episcopacy (Gitari, 2014:74). Thus, the 1970s came to be referred to as the generation of being born again (Gathogo, 2016:8). Consequently, the 2015 Kabale Convention in Uganda exhorted Brethren to... consider their call (1 Cor.1:26). Further, GAFCON 2013 recollected EARM teaching as fundamental to salvation whereby the conviction of sin was noted to be central to revival (Walton, 2013: Online).

The EARM’s worship style appeared to conflict with that of the Anglican Church with some members, especially Joremo opting for a spiritual separation in 1953 (Welbourn and Ogot, 1963:33, 34) as they felt aggrieved by admission of nominal Christians (those who do not walk in the light) in the fellowships. Others like Kaggians, left physically, abandoning the Anglican Prayer Book to form a non-denominational Pentecostal church (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:31).

About Kufufuka and Kusimama factions, though they observe a similar stereotyping worship style held their local fellowships separately (Gitari, n.d:5) for the better part of the second epoch. This exclusive and discriminatory attitude hinders young people from attending the revival fellowships. Nonetheless, a huge convention in 2011 of young Brethren at Lenana School in Nairobi is a welcome move. Furthermore, the reference to Brethren’s maxim of walking in the light during Nairobi GAFCON communique 2016 demonstrates its central place in the Anglican spirituality. Nevertheless, Gathogo (2016:7-8) observes that majority of Brethren leaders lack theological training, and sometimes make ignorant decisions.

5.3.1.3 Moral codes

Questionable teachings by Noo’s did not only encourage women to leave their unsaved husbands but also encouraged opposite sexes to sleep together simply because they were saved (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:30), leading to sexual impropriety and other nefarious practices. Thus, Gathogo (2016:8) observes confessions of cheating spouses, despite hitherto appearing trustworthy.

About the handling of Fellowship finances, Brethren just walk in the light (MacMaster & Jacobs, 2006:181). Thus members of Brethren opposed to accounting procedures introduced Mfuko wa Bwana (The Lord’s Bag) for they saw money as a source of evil and left to form Kufufuka (Resurrection) or Re-awakened faction based on Ephesians 5:14-15 (Mambo, 1973:115). Further, Gathogo (2016:7) contends that the Kufufuka Brethren were discouraged from taking bank loans because Christ paid their debts on the Cross. However, Gathogo (2016:8) maintains that Kufufuka revival of 1967, witnessed people from the mainline churches convert to this faith. Nevertheless, in the late 1990s, Kamau (2001:28) notices Mfuko wa Bwana controversy within Kusimama faction following an exaggerated budget for a Convention.
5.3.2 Empirical analyses

The empirical analysis cannot be complete without assessing the reliability of the research instruments used during the research project in the four dioceses. As suggested in chapter 1, a reliability test was to be done to establish the replication of the research findings. Therefore, a pilot study (see consent letter – annexure 9) was conducted in February 2017 in the Anglican Diocese of Mbeere (within Mount Kenya region) which did not participate in the actual study. The collected data from the four select dioceses were evaluated vis-à-vis the Diocese of Mbeere and findings were consistent, and thus instruments were reliable and valid for generalization to other ACK Dioceses and beyond (see annexure 10).

Additionally, as a recap, it is pivotal to note the research project in the four select dioceses had six categories of research respondents/participants. These were ordinary members, leaders, theological students, clergy, bishops and prominent stakeholders. The participants’ responses are adduced from the perspective of conversion, worship style, and moral codes.

5.3.2.1 Conversion

Concerning conversion, the majority of Brethren especially the ordinary and leaders of Revival Fellowships across the four dioceses were found to give their born again testimony regarding full disclosure of identity from the viewpoint of life in the past, present, and future expectations – demonstrating their sojourn with Christ every hour. Indeed, they repent and confess their past sins in detail, one by one followed by the restitution and forgiveness. They testify to conquer the devil with the blood of the lamb and by the word of their testimony (Rev. 12:11).

Concerning knowledge of Keswick theology, only 20% of all respondents have heard about its teachings. Of this percentage, the prominent stakeholders by their academic pursuit have a clean sheet of 100% knowledge while all other categories depict little or no knowledge at all. Certainly some clergy mistook it for Keswick Bookshop in Nairobi. However, while some clergy described Keswick theology as a wave of revival and renewal over East Africa, explicated by profound salvation experiences, some prominent stakeholders not only positioned it within the wider holiness movement but also emphasized conversion and personal holiness exemplified by the infilling of the Holy Spirit.

Still, other stakeholders’ associated it with the strict pietistic theology of being saved and daily sanctification which entrenched legalistic spirituality and prompted daily devotions and a profound sense of accountability. While some other respondents’ associated influence of EARM to conventions, beliefs and practices of walking in the light and overnight fellowships, some stakeholders said it was influenced by Pentecostalism and the born again culture with the strict religious position. Additionally, other stakeholders attribute the influence to the Victorian ideals.
that restrain sex and depict strict moral codes. Besides, others saw a lack of theological knowledge as a prelude to the belief and practice of walking in the light. This view echoes a bishop and theological students who attribute it to a literal interpretation of Scripture.

5.3.2.2 Worship style

Some ordinary members argue against intrusive testimony which appears not only to intrude into people’s lives but also portray different standing with other Christians, which affects church witness and growth of the mission. Indeed, some claim that in the 1960s, this attitude informed strict moral codes like refraining from a bank loan and getting saved anew, which led to separate fellowship meetings and lapsed in holiness and witnessing Spirit. However, others argue that in 1970s splits impacted the mission of the church positively with smart dressing codes and preaching from the Bible.

But then in the 1990s youth left the church for reasons of hairdos, dressing code, use of public address system and Pentecostal worship. This is consistent with some leaders and a Bishop who say that the split within the Brethren led to new fellowships and new denominations. Thus, argue some ordinary members, this created tension within Brethren and with other Christians particularly clergy who were considered not saved. Indeed, one of the prominent stakeholders said that EARM considers itself as the legislators of the church with the majority of Anglican bishops declaring to be part of the revival, which is a boost for the church’s mission if the declaration is not schizophrenic in faith.

Indeed, most respondents expressed the need for an extensive and diversified church ministry and mission, especially in the areas of leadership, moral code dynamism, worship in spirit, and academics. Indeed, about leadership, one of the prominent stakeholders said Bishop Obadiah Kariuki, a member of EARM, in 1969 confronted Kenyatta to stop forcing church elders to take the oath. However, Bishop John Mahiani was almost chased away from the fellowship for associating with a splinter group. Thus, one of the Bishops and some clergy maintain that Brethren should seek not only to coexist with other Christians but to work with the Anglican Church leadership.

Therefore, a prominent stakeholder said the Anglican Church should encourage great flexibility and tolerance of different views. Moreover, a group of Theological students and clergy expressed a need for dynamism in the Fellowship with full participation of all ages. Indeed, some ordinary members suggested the opposite sex should hug one another. Furthermore, while one of the prominent stakeholders recommended that Bishops should be transferable to share their gifts with the whole Anglican Church of Kenya, anothers expressed a need to look at the relationship between the older Balokole (saved ones in Luganda) movement and modern charismatic/Pentecostalism in the light of their thoughts and practices. This is because the earlier EARM was founded within the context of the overwhelming power of the Holy Spirit, which appears to anchor proliferation of Pentecostal churches today.

Also, one of the prominent stakeholders encouraged clergy, bishops and ACK Academics like the researcher, to fellowship with East Africa Revival groups, to influence and be influenced by each other. Thus, a group of ordinary members urged St Andrew’s College lecturers not only to follow-up students during mission outreaches to offer mentorship, but also to teach them that priesthood is a calling, not a job.

5.3.2.3 Moral codes

About moral codes, the majority of respondents observed that interpretations of various biblical texts not only appear to inform the splits but also the moral codes. The most mentioned texts were Ephesians 5:14 and Daniel 1:8ff at 16 and 14 times respectively. Others were 2 Cor. 6:14-18 at 6, 1 Cor.11:14-16 at 6, Gen. 12.1 at 5, Ephesians 6:14-20 at 5, Romans 13:8 at 4 and Psalms 127:1 at 2. These texts seemed to contribute most significantly to the development of some unique Brethren lifestyles.

Indeed, the majority of the respondents asserted that interpretation of various texts was understood to leave EARM. Certainly, the concept of leaving was espoused by some ordinary members and some leaders who argued that Ephesian 5:14 and Daniel 1:8-15 were interpreted to mean leave. The leave concept culminated, respectively, to Kufufuka (Arise, Awake) faction in 1967 and Mtama na Maji (sorghum and water) in 1969 which some clergy associated with the Kupaa (Rising) wing in 1987. Thus, on the one hand, Kufufuka required the saved people to be saved again, because as a prominent stakeholder notes, those who continually confess sins after conversion were dead for they have no power of Spirit to overcome sin. This signified Kusimama Brethren were dead, which led to standing firm (Standing/Kusimama) faction derived from Eph.6:14. The stand firm concept was used by some leaders to encourage Christians to withstand challenges. Thus the phrase Yesu atosha (Jesus satisfies) became Kusimama’s motto.

On the other hand, the Kupaa faction discouraged luxurious lifestyle. Consequently, as some leaders observed, Kupaa avoided social gatherings believed to entertain guests with royal diet. Indeed, the concept of leaving is also depicted in the interpretation of 2 Cor. 6:14-17 and Geneses 12:1. While in respect to the former, a prominent stakeholder observes that some Brethren uses this text to hedge themselves from the rest of Christian community, perceived to be living in sin, thus, entrenching an arrogant attitude. Regarding the latter, some leaders and theological students (who referred to them as Thama, a Gikuyu word for leave/Exodus) perceived that some Brethren sold everything and physically left their families to serve God. Certainly, some leaders said that some parents used the Genesis text to desert their unwedded pregnant daughters.

Some other texts like 1 Cor. 11:14-16; Psalms 127:1 and Romans 13:8 were used to entrench social conventions and the dressing code. Indeed, some leaders, clergy and a bishop noted that 1 Cor. 11:14-16 was interpreted to mean men should not keep beards or long hair and women should cover their heads, especially when praying. Still, other leaders used Psalms 127:1 to claim that since God is their protector, there is no need for keeping dogs or any other form of security. Furthermore, about Romans 13:8, one of the stakeholders said, Tusiwe na deni (we should not have debt) which could have contributed to avoidance of bank loans by some Brethren.

However, not all splits were a result of interpretation of Scripture. Indeed, leadership and the public confession of sins were primarily found to have caused division. Indeed, whereas one of the prominent stakeholders said members of Brethren who were retired teachers imposed themselves too firmly, the other (prominent stakeholder) saw the question of polygamy to have brought the split between Jorem and Johera. While Johera argued that polygamists were honest and should be loved, the hypocritical Jorem pushed them away. Thus, some ordinary members said the fact that Brethren view themselves as the holier-than-thou impede the church mission.

Regarding the open confession of sin, some leaders blamed their fellow Brethren for compelling new members to publicly repent their sins as a means of admission into the Fellowship. Conversely, some leaders cautioned that the New Testament should not be used as an instruction manual for norms and overly burdensome instructions.

About other moral codes, some leaders said while Brethren instructs on dictums of ethical codes, they should engage in economic activities, encouraging welfare groups and opening saving accounts. Thus, some ordinary members and clergy expressed a need for Brethren to avoid legalistic rules and embrace change that promotes youth to join the Fellowship. So, on the one hand, theological students said Brethren should learn exegesis and interpretation of the Bible. On the other hand, some leaders argued that the Church should refocus on strengthening biblical knowledge and Christian witness to attract the younger generation.

5.3.3 Analysis of affinity between historical and empirical trends

In order to have a full thrust into the current trend today; it is necessary to consider a synopsis of historical and empirical harmony from the perspective of conversion, worship style, and moral codes.
5.3.3.1 Conversion

The Joremo and Johera factions which infiltrated the church in Western Kenya in the early years of Revival in Kenya, appear to echo the current trend of Kufufuka and Kusimama factions in the Mount Kenya region today. While Joremo, Welbourn and Ogot (1963:33, 34) felt aggrieved by the admission of nominal Christians into the fellowships, a prominent stakeholder argued that Kufufuka used Ephesian 5:14 to claim other Brethren are dead and should be saved again. Nonetheless, Johera eventually severed its ties with the Anglican Church in 1958 to form the Church of Christ in Africa (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966: 57). However, some leaders assert that Kusimama used Eph.6:14 to encourage itself to stand firm against challenges because of Yesu atosha (Jesus satisfies), and works in close cooperation with the Anglican Church today, a disposition upheld by Kufufuka.

But as Mambo (1973:111-12) observes, Brethren’s tribulations by the church leadership over the open confession of sin and constant claim to have been born again is yet to be resolved. Thus, argue some ordinary members, Brethren’s reference to other Christians, particularly clergy, as not saved, just because they neither attend fellowship nor walk in the light, creates a disturbing tension. Indeed, Brethren’s sanctimonious display is further illustrated in the confession of sins especially of adultery, which for instance led a bishop to lose his episcopacy (Gitari, 2014:74). Although Karanja (2012: 146) claims public confession of sins has been discouraged, it seems to continue unabated. Indeed, some leaders observe that new members are compelled to publicly repent their sins as a means of admission into the Fellowship.

5.3.3.2 Worship Style

Indeed, separate fellowship meetings by Kusimama and Kufufuka until the 1980s disillusioned the youth (Gitari, n.d:5) as to hinder their attendance of revival fellowships. Even though the two factions somewhat meet in the local fellowships, young people still feel excluded due to stereotyping liturgical worship. Thus, some leaders argue that in 1990s youth left the church for reasons of hairdos, dressing code, use of public address system and Pentecostal worship. Furthermore, other leaders and a Bishop say that the impact of the split within the Brethren led to new fellowships and new denominations.

Nonetheless, a huge convention of young Brethren at Lenana School in 2011 illustrates a new dawn to narrow the generation gap. This is consistent with a group of Theological students and clergy who expressed a need for dynamism in the Fellowship with full participation of all ages. Furthermore, the reference to Brethren’s maxim of walking in the light during Nairobi GAFCON communique 2016 appears to demonstrate its defining spirituality in the Anglican Church of Kenya. Indeed, one of the prominent stakeholders maintains that EARM was founded within the context of the overwhelming power of the Holy Spirit, which appears to anchor proliferation of Pentecostal churches today, something that Brethren should consider exploring.

5.3.3.3 Moral codes

Issues of morality which are foundational to the current trend came to the fore right after revival entered Kenya. A good example is the teachings by Noo’s who in his ignorance claimed opposite sexes could sleep together simply because they were saved because to the pure all things are pure (Welbourn and Ogot, 1966:30). Even though the majority of Brethren leaders lack theological training, and sometimes make ignorant decisions (Gathogo, 2016:7-8), this unorthodox teaching is unacceptable to Brethren today. Indeed, a group of ordinary members emphasized the importance of moral teachings at St Andrew’s college to curb what they perceive as questionable behaviour among some young people enrolled for ministerial qualifications.

Another element buttressed in the Brethren’s ethical behaviour is what has been noted by Langley and Kiggins (1974:2002), as the strict legalistic behaviour such as do not drink, do not smoke, do not part your hair, and do not wear short skirts. Surely this sort of admonition persists to date and alienates many admirers. Thus, some ordinary members attribute the failure of growth of Brethren Fellowship to the fact that they view themselves as the self-righteous, which impedes the church’s mission. Besides some leaders argue that some parents treat as outcast their daughters who get pregnant before marriage.

Finally, Mfuko wa Bwana (The Lord’s Bag) initially started by the Kutfutuka who did not approve accounting and auditing procedures as they believed in walking in the light (Mambo, 1973:115). However, in 1998, Kamau (2001:41) highlights a controversy within the Kusimama associated with the Mfuko wa Bwana, occasioned by an exaggerated budget for a convention. Undoubtedly, although Mfuko wa Bwana appears to substitute accounting and banking procedures as a recourse to avoid what one of the stakeholder’s terms, tusiwe na deni (we should not have debt), it has nevertheless not only bolstered their inclusive tenets but also shut options for welfare economic activities.

5.4 ANGLICAN CHURCH MISSION STATEMENT PERSPECTIVE TO SUMMARIZE THE CURRENT SITUATION AS IT SHOULD BE

The Church Diary and Lectionary of the Anglican Church of Kenya (2017) state the mission of Anglican Church of Kenya (ACK) thus, “To equip God’s people to transform the society with the Gospel”, which is driven by the vision, “a growing, caring Anglican Church boldly proclaiming Christ.” Therefore, to summarize the current situation from the perspective of the Anglican Church mission statement, it is critical to bring to the fore Luke’s description of the growth of Jesus from the viewpoint of increase in wisdom, in stature and favour with God and man (Luke 2:52). This concept of growth, in a nutshell, appears to demonstrate the Anglican Church mission. So, to put this text into its rightful place, it is necessary to debunk it (growth concept).

Bock (1994:274) claims that the mention of both God and humans in Luke’s text illustrates the fact that the growth of Jesus could not be hidden. The increase in wisdom (σοφία) argues Bock (1994:268) refers to Jesus’ increase in insight described in Greek as συνέσει (synesei) which signifies understanding that penetrates the crux of the matter. Thus, Lenski (1946; 170) states that Jesus kept growing in wisdom. This growth is consistent with Bovon (2002:115) who introduces προκόπτω translated to make progress. While ήλικια (hēlikia) explains stature as a physical growth (Bock, 1994:274), Bovon (2002:115) terms it a stage in life, as to designate the physical size and not in age (Lensiki, 1946:170). Concerning χάρις (chariti) Bock (1994:274) translates grace or favour as moral growth and favourable nature which Bovon (2002:115) reckons χάρις (favour) as to depict relationship, in this case of divine and human, which Lenski (1946:170) affirms, and adds that this progress continues in a three nouns datives of relations (in wisdom, in stature and favour).

Indeed, the ACK mission does not only seek to equip but also to transform the society with the Gospel of Jesus Christ which could be viewed from at least four dimensions; mental (wisdom), physical (stature), spiritual (favour with God) and social (favour with man). This means that ACK mission cannot be seen to be complete without engaging the four dimensions of growth which is pivotal to the transformative gospel. As seen in chapter 1, the Gospel is not only evangelistic but is also a social responsibility (Bosch, 2011:418) which means due justice should be equally apportioned to both spiritual and non-spiritual tasks. This echoes the Lausanne Covenant (attended by David Gitari later Archbishop of ACK from 1997 – 2002) during The International Congress on World Evangelization at Lausanne in July 1974 which expressed penitence for neglect and sometimes regarding evangelism and social concern as exclusive (Gitari, 2014:27). Indeed, the 1982 Grand Rapids Report on Evangelism and Social Responsibility: An Evangelical Commitment stated that Christian social concern could be not only a consequence of evangelism but also a bridge to evangelism and a partner of evangelism (Gitari, 2014:130). This interlocking relationship appears to inform ACK transformative mission from the perspective of the four dimensions of growth which are summarized below. Eventually, this relationship lays the foundation for the prevailing situation as it should be, via the overarching triad of conversion, worship, and moral codes.

5.4.1 Mental transformation

Mental change is brought to the fore by the progressive training and education through ACK academic institutes like St Paul’s University (SPU), its affiliate’s colleges, and industrial institutions. On the one hand, St Paul's University's (2016: online) mission appears consistent with ACK in that it champions the development of servant leaders by imparting knowledge, skills and values, and Christian spiritual formation. Thus, among the faculties are theology and social sciences with programmes ranging from certificate to Ph.D. (SPU, 2016: online). Thus, graduates from theology are passionate about their calling and find work in community transformation, chaplaincy and lay ministry. Likewise, social sciences graduates confront developmental challenges such as poverty and persistent conflicts at various levels. No wonder in the first section of this chapter, Kraft (1996:xiv) conceptualizes a Christian ministry which is not only culturally formed, but that also responds to Gospel confrontation of culture from the vantage point of people’s lifestyle. Thus, St Paul's University seeks not only to equip graduates with mental tools for life but also to influence community with the gospel of Christ positively.

On the other hand, the ACK mission incorporates equipment for technical and vocational training appropriate for entrepreneurship and self-propelled income generating projects as a way of providing self-employment. Indeed, church involvement with industrial training has been a key pillar to training for social, economic and political development as opposed to the pietistic approach to education (Church of the Province of Kenya, 1994:48). Furthermore, Church of the Province of Kenya (1994:48) captures George David’s (a freed slave from Bombay) sentiments concerning industrial training, “Missionaries should concentrate more on industrial training which would enable Africans to provide for themselves: this would make the Christian life more meaningful and attract people to the faith, whereas the ascetic life of self-denial and indifference to all worldly enjoyments and employments emphasized by Rebmann only aroused people’s admiration without converting them to Christianity.”

The industrial training reverberates the Lausanne Covenant document on Christian social responsibility (Gitari, 2014:27) discussed earlier. It informs Christian Industrial Training centres (CICT) which not only provide quality vocational and commercial training to the less privileged youth today but also empower them to compete in the job market or start and run fruitful businesses (Kenyaplex, 2008-2017: online). Equally significant to positive mental growth is the Bible Translation and Literacy (BTL), which again is a fundamental tenet of ACK mission emphasis. The church has been keen to translate Bibles into vernacular for all Christians, which resonates with missio logoi tenets discussed in chapter 4, and points to the fact that spiritual ministry must take flesh in human languages and cultures. Thus, BTL facilitates Bible translation, sustainable literacy and language development programmes amongst marginalized language groups in Kenya and beyond, isolated by the harsh climate and rough terrain (BTL, 2016: online). Indeed in 1972 Rev David Gitari, in his role as Executive Secretary of the Bible

5.4.2 Physical transformation

As regards physical change, the equipping aspect of the ACK mission informs physical growth, which could be translated to numerical expansion across the current 34 dioceses as shown in the Anglican Church Diary and Lectionary 2017. Indeed, by 1960 the diocese of Mombasa under Bishop L. J. Beecher was one massive area covering the whole province of Kenya (Church of the Province of Kenya, 1994:114), and had a membership of less than 500,000 (Barrett, 1973:184). However, today ACK has a population of about 5 million (Anglican Church of Kenya, 2017: online) which indicate ten times growth over the last fifty years. The relatively large population has seen widespread infrastructural growth in church buildings and related church sponsored facilities like the Anglican Development Services (ADS) which is a development arm of the church.

As the Church remains a place of comfort, hope, and renewal, especially for the vulnerable, it is critical for ADS to facilitate the transformative mandate of the gospel of Jesus Christ (Luke 4:18-19) to alleviate all forms of poverty, injustices, and ignorance (ACK, 2009: online). Indeed, as Gitari (2014:115) observes, evangelism and pastoral responsibilities are significant concerns for the mission, but not at the expense of community health, agricultural projects and social work. Further, ADS mission mandate has led to general transformative structures like Mount Kenya hospital and Utlugi (Grace) Children Home, which respectively attend human physical and social needs. Thus, while these structures complement the mental development above, they also provide an appropriate nurturing environment for spiritual and social strands of societal transformation with the gospel of Christ as demonstrated below.

5.4.3 Spiritual transformation

The forms of worship in the Anglican Church appear to have changed dramatically since the beginning of the 21st century in the light of contextual worship dynamics. The ACK new prayer book, Our Modern Services, cited earlier in this chapter, seems to incorporate cultural, spiritual dynamics demonstrated by a prayer of thanksgiving for faithful ancestors and throwing problems to the cross of Christ. Similarly, the new hymn book, Nyimbo Cia Gucanjamura Ngoro (songs of praise) has brought back the traditional rhythmic expressions that allow for vibrant worship. Indeed, ACK has not only invested its resources in the ministerial formation of clergy and church leaders but also in the music industry.

Indeed, young people are encouraged to compose important Christian music to help lead Christians to respond to God in their context. Admittedly, the majority of research respondents (chapter 3) recommended dynamic worship style as a strategy of worshipping God in Spirit and truth. Thus, while worship style aims at retaining the young people in the church, it also targets at wooing back those who had left to join Pentecostal churches. Accordingly, while mission strategies informed by talented Christian musicians and vibrant modern public address systems have led to somewhat entertaining worship and open air crusades. ACK mission statement reminds worshippers that it is all about holistic Christian family response to God’s gift of adoption following justification. Surely, charismatic fervour in the ACK has brought outstanding liturgical renewal that allows for corporate and personal prayers, mostly within the Anglican tradition.

Indeed, this spiritual development seems to have been occasioned not only by corporate liturgical worship but also by church organized quiet time like Safari ya Biblia (walk through the Bible) in ACK Diocese of Kirinyaga. Indeed, a trip to the Holy Land, Israel in July 2017 saw Kirinyaga Diocese join many others in retracing the Nativity of Jesus, which brings to life profound biblical understanding of the life of Christ and profound spiritual transformation.

However, the events of the post-election violence (2007 and 2017) puts a dent in the Anglican spirituality and other denominations at large. This is illustrated by a high level of dichotomy about believers associating with one political party as opposed to the other, with consequent spates of post-election violence. This dichotomy echoes political alignment in Uganda in the 1960s, where, while the Roman Catholic Church identified with the Democratic Party and the Protestant Church of Uganda associated with Uganda’s People’s Congress (Anderson, 1977:135-136). Certainly, such dichotomy spells doom to a well-phrased mission statement. Nonetheless, when the church adheres to this transformative mission which pervades cultural, ethnic and political boundaries, it is the light and the salt of the earth (Matt. 5:13-16) in which brothers and sisters love and encourage one another (Hebrews 10:24-25).

5.4.4 Social transformation

As a response to God’s favour expressed in spiritual equipping, the social change should be the obvious outcome. Indeed some social growth centres like CICT and Utugi Children Home mentioned above are basic to development even at the basic level. For instance, CICT Nairobi equips vulnerable children from the nearby Majengo slums with not only vocational skills like mechanical engineering, electrical installation and food and beverage but also with good morals as a way of enhancing secure and honest livelihood (Kenplex, 2008-2017: online).

Furthermore, ACK Kirinyaga Diocese (2016: online) within the rural Kenya, through Utugi Children Centre provides solace for the orphans and vulnerable children from the street and less privileged families’ holistic education and vocational training founded on sound Christian morals. This wholesome concept depicts what Gitari (2014:40-41) terms holistic gospel (Luke 4:18-19; Matt. 9:35) of body and spirit (psychosomatic unit), which not only evangelizes and responds to the spiritual needs but also attends to the physical needs of God’s people.

5.4.5 Summary of the current situation (of walking in the light) as it should be

To summarize the current trend as it should be in the ACK Mount Kenya region, the above debunked ACK mission statement, which equips and transforms the community with the Gospel of Christ, informs this summary. Thus, while Brethren should view other Christians not only as truly converted, they should also embrace vibrant spirituality to inform beliefs and practices of walking in the light. Hence, to craft a new concept of walking in the light from the perspective of ACK mission statement, it is critical for Brethren to accommodate change. The change should not only address the way they understand their conversion (born again) experiences but also the way they express their worship style and the subsequent moral codes.

5.4.5.1 Conversion experience as it should be

About conversion experience, ACK mission of transformative gospel not only incorporates all Christians but leaves the door open for the Gospel to influence non-Christians. Certainly, the fundamental goal of the mission is not just Christian conversion, but also responsible coexistence with one’s neighbour. The manifesto of Jesus expressed particularly in Luke 4:18-19, which Gitari (2014:27,40) says had a profound impact on his conception of holistic mission of the church, echoes The Lausanne Covenant sentiments to the effect that evangelism and social concern are flipsides of one coin. Indeed, earlier in this chapter, Nikolajsen (2013:465) uses the word koinonia to express fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 1:9) and with one another (1 John 1:3) as part of the mission of the church. Certainly, this is the way forward for Brethren’s born again testimony, which should inform the whole lifestyle that depicts Christians as a family that has received the Spirit of adoption as to call God, Father Abba (Romans 8:15-16).

In essence, sonship is a gift and has nothing to do with human efforts (Frame, 2013:976 -977), it is subsequent to justification (ground of forgiveness and acceptance) and should inform lifestyle of those who have received the new birth. Thus, Brethren’s born again behaviour should be consistent with the fact that salvation is a gift of God, endowed to believers, not by merit, but because of what God did for humanity at the Cross. This means sanctification, which is evidence of justification, should be understood as the achieving of God’s renewing spirit that informs believers’ growth in holiness as they humbly respond by loving God and neighbour. So, daily walk with God/experiential sanctification should express a mutual relationship with God reflected in the holistic mission which equips and transforms the society with the Gospel. Conversely, conversion is accepting the Lordship of Christ and not just joining a family (Bosch, 1991:488), which ACK mission affirms both in its evangelism and social action roles in the society.

Certainly, an experiential sanctification which is pompous (as achieved by Brethren), is not a badge to enroll with CITC or Utugi Children’s Home, but expressions of love for the vulnerable in the society (Math 25:34-40). Inevitably, social responsibility expresses tenets of the kingdom and indeed demonstrates actual conversion. Indeed, judging from Jesus’ teaching, the saved or the righteous person before God is the one who takes care of the sick and suffering (physical needs) as opposed to Pharisaic hypocrisy destined to damnation (Matt 25:41-46). Thus, pilgrimage method of sharing a testimony regarding past, present and future which is hypocritical should change to incorporate not only social action to the needy neighbour but also to fellowship with other Christians and enquirers.

5.4.5.2 Worship style as it should be

About worship style, the order of service in the Our Modern Services ACK new prayer book boast of a relaxed liturgy that does not only reserve time for prayerful choruses/hymns but also provides for extemporaneous prayers (ACK, 2003:14). This freedom appears to have led more people, especially youth returning to the Anglican Church. Furthermore, in chapter 3 a research respondent argues for the importance of teaching the value of worship and practices of the Anglican Church to inform new forms of spirituality among young people. Therefore, it is pivotal for the Brethren to adopt new ways of spirituality within the Anglican Church mission as a way of embracing change cognizant of the Gospel. Also, in chapter 4 worship dynamics were alluded to by Ngugi (2017) as he welcomed a delegation of the Kenyan Anglican clergy visiting the Anglican Diocese of Chelmsford, UK to reverberate the conference with vibrant ACK worship informed by the African dynamics.

Undoubtedly, these worship dynamics appear to capture ACK’s mission of equipping God’s people to transform the society with the Gospel. In other words, it is not just worship, but one which is consonant with African rhythmic style, as to respond to God in truth and the Spirit. That being the case, it is vital to agree with O’Brien (2013:339) that worship as invitation leads to worship as participation within the church from which the people of God participate in the missio Dei. Since the mission of ACK is to equip and change people to take part in the church mission within missio Dei, it is pivotal that Brethren should allow a worship style that does not only inform inclusive participation but is also compliant with missio Dei.

5.4.5.3 Moral codes as they should be

As regards moral codes, the human being is a psychosomatic unit comprising of body and spirit. Hence, social responsibility and spiritual formation are twin doors of one house, in this case, one community or family of God. Therefore, religious and social dynamics should equally define human development from the vertical and horizontal perspective, in the sense of loving God and neighbour. Indeed, St Paul's University’s (2010-2017; online) motto, Servants of God and Humanity appear to resonate ACK mission statement of equipping humanity to change the society with the good news of the Lord Jesus Christ. Truly, Brethren, if they have good theological education, should be at the forefront of transforming the society. Unfortunately, codes of ethics have to a large extent been informed by the Brethren's literal interpretation of the Bible. It will, therefore, take ingenuity of the church through BTL and Theological Education by Extension programmes, to encourage and motivate Brethren literacy in theology to inform acceptable Christian moral codes.

Furthermore, the two case scenarios about CICT and Utugi Children’s Home provide holistic education to the vulnerable children who combine vocational skills with sound Christian morals. Certainly, Brethren are not left behind regarding strict ethical morals but fall short of social responsibility. Consequently, the Mfuko wa Bwana (The Lord’s Bag) aspect should not only follow accounting and auditing procedures but also support other Christians and church activities. Surely, the most efficient way to walk in the light is not necessary via moral codes of do’s and don’ts but through reaching out to the needy in the community. Indeed, dressing codes and hairdos shouldn’t be the means to an end. While it is critical to observe is acceptable Christian social convention, social welfare activities should take precedence because of its concern for the entire community, not a supercilious minority group. When ACK mission speaks about societal change, the point of reference is a gospel influencing community as to participate in the mission of God. Surely, then, Brethren should overhaul its dictum of walking in the light to conform to real light of Christ in real society. Indeed, society influenced by the gospel of transformation within missio Dei which is not only inclusive but also participates in self-help social, economic projects that include access to bank loans.

5.5 Viable Biblically Based Model of Missio Dei

A biblical model of missio Dei is one that demonstrates walk with God in both the OT and the NT. Indeed, chapter two of this study shows that the two Testaments are prima facie of walking in the light in the missio Dei, whereby the biblical concept of walking in the light is identical to walking with God. Whereas Gen.5:21-24; 6:9 indicate Enoch and Noah had a righteous walk with God, 2 Peter 3:9 shows that we are to walk in the light of the Lord’s return. Indeed, the Hebrew word which translates walk is הָלַךְ (ha.lakh) which means to go or to walk with God. The writer of Hebrews credits this habitual walk with God to faith and Enoch was reckoned to have pleased God (Heb. 11:5-6). Likewise Abraham walked in the way of the Lord, indeed a model for God’s people (Genesis 18:19) associated with doing righteousness and justice which imply that Israel was to mirror divine activity, a visible exemplar to the nations as to the nature and character of their God (Wright, 2006:363).

Undoubtedly, contends Wright (2006:365, 367,368) to walk in the way of the Lord, means doing for others what God has already done for us, which suggests right human actions and relationships tantamount to social justice – with powerful ethical and missiological impact. Indeed, moral quality of the Israelites in the form of ethical obedience links their calling to mission, for there is no biblical mission without biblical ethics (Wright, 2006:369). Indeed ACK mission statement, observed earlier, depicts the gospel of Jesus Christ as the good news of transformation of humanity, particularly for the vulnerable (Matt. 25:34-46). Consequently, the interface of ethical living/social responsibility and Christian witness are viewed as two sides of the same coin. But as seen throughout this study Brethren appear to have missed this very excellent point as they tended to conform to legalism leading to exclusive self-righteous and hypocritical lifestyle of walking in the light.

Following this, it is the mandate of this research to attempt to construct a viable biblical model of missio Dei. Evidently, the existing model appears to have been driven by moral codes with Christ seemingly relegated to the periphery in what looks like a self-directed lifestyle. It is therefore critical that a viable biblical model should demonstrate a Christ directed lifestyle tantamount to changed world model informed by the Great Commission.

Nonetheless, Brethren passionately preach Christ crucified, though their stringent beliefs and practices of walking in the light appear to overshadow the good news of salvation following justification of sinners. The fact that the act of justification declares the regenerate righteous before God overtakes Brethren’s self-righteousness that creates two categories of Christians, the born again (those who walk in the light and attend Fellowship), and the ordinary Christians. So, an examination of a self-directed model is significant to the understanding of the new model of walking in the light.

5.5.1 Self-directed lifestyle (Brethren's old model)

Figure 8 below illustrates a self-directed way of life (Brethren’s Old Model) in which self-interests are enthroned in place of Christ and directs myriads of interests purported to be informed by Christ. The various sizes of dots indicate viewpoints of inequality which inspire or breathe out (through the funnel) aspirations of members of EARM (Brethren) into the mission field. Thus, Mackenzie (2015:259) observes that while using Jesus as a model for Christian mission, churches have elevated the concept of Jesus as Saviour to the point of abandoning Jesus’ life and ministry. The consequence has been disastrous leading to discord and frustrations within the Brethren relationship, on the one hand, and with other Christians, on the other.
Indeed viewpoints in connection with stereotyping testimonies and legalistic worship style, and the subsequent moral codes appear to blur walking in the light. This is consistent with chapter 3 and 4 of this research, which demonstrate various biblical passages that led not only to discord and frustrations among the Brethren but also to strict moral codes that hinder the growth of the Fellowship. Therefore, whereas Ephesians 5:14 led to dissension between Kufufuka and Kusimama, Daniel 1:8-15 and Ephesians 6:13 respectively, resulted in simple lifestyle and strict hairdos/dressing codes. Still, Ngwata niro ya utheri (Fellowship of the light) based on Matt. 5:14, an offshoot of Kupaa ironically accept greetings, “praise the Lord” yet does not recognize weddings of expectant girls. Therefore, divisions, hypocrisy, and the quest for propriety have maintained status quo which informs sanctimonious exclusiveness that distorts missiological dynamics within the Fellowship and has negative impacts on the ACK mission.

Indeed, the admirers of Brethren are barred from attending the fellowship just because their conversion testimony lacks pilgrimage perspective. Indeed, ordinary members who participated in this research says that Brethren repent and confess their past sins one by one followed by restitution and forgiveness. Surely, where it was necessary to repay back stolen properties, they did so, which resonates with Zacchaeus announcement (Lk 19:8) to give back what he could have acquired by defraud.

Indeed, perspectives of Brethren’s literal interpretation of Scripture has been propounded in this study and informs their interests (moral codes). Surely, literal interpretation isn’t exceptional though, in this case, it appears to have further pushed ways of giving testimony. This has been demonstrated by way of disclosure of the past sins by way of restitution, which depending on nature and magnitude could be disastrous not only to the born again person but also to the fact that it entrenches the two Christian scenarios. That is, the born again (the ones who undertakes this rigorous process of becoming a member of Brethren) and the ordinary Christian (who disregards the process). Mostly, this idea of achieving born again testimony hinders Brethren’s participation in the missio Dei. Certainly, if Brethren would shelve their self-interest as to express salvation within the covenant of grace, then their faithful participation in the missio Dei is conceivable. It is elucidated below.

5.5.2 Christ directed lifestyle (Brethren's New model)

![Diagram of FRUITFULNESS ABUNDANCE]

The self-directed model of breathing out legalistic moral codes ought to be replaced by Christ directed model of fruitfulness in abundance illustrated in figure 9. This new design depicts Christ on the throne where the self-life yields to the Lordship of Christ. The interests are not only Christ-centred but also Christ directed as to inform individual parity in harmony with God’s plan for salvation. The holier-than-thou predisposition of Brethren is replaced with the self-effacing or modest conceptualization of conversion and worship style which informs beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

5.5.2.1 Christ directed conversion model of fruitfulness abundance

The fact that regeneration or new birth is an activity of God in which believers are passive informs the new conversion model of Brethren. Additionally, unlike regeneration, conversion is action oriented (Phil. 2:12-13) achieved through repentance and faith in a genuine covenant relationship in Christ (Horton, 2011:576). So, when Jesus told Nicodemus that he must be born again (John 3:3), he meant new birth, which is spiritual and is by faith because it is an action of God as an antecedent to participating in the kingdom. Accordingly, genuine conversion illustrates an inward change that must be demonstrated in a life of love and righteousness (Mt. 3:8; Lk.3:10-14). Therefore, while the new model suggests conversion experience consonant with a mutual covenant relationship with Christ, informed by repentance and faith, the necessary response is the lifestyle of genuine love and righteousness. Undoubtedly, the missionary mandate calls upon Brethren to participate in the mission of God concerning calling other Christian worshipers to fellowship with God.

Indeed, a real conversion testimony arises from what God through Christ has done in the life of the believer at justification. It has nothing to do with the believers’ efforts. Thus, all believers are made righteous by what God did on the cross of Christ, and none is more saved than the other. All have received the gift of sonship through adoption not only as children who call God, Abba, Father, but also as co-heirs with Christ (Romans 8:15-17). Surely, then, sanctifying faith is within the limits of Brethren’s covenant relationship that renders Christians a family of God bound by the love of Christ on the Cross. This sanctifying faith suggests a Christ directed lifestyle that shuns sanctimonious tendencies of the old model.

5.5.2.2 Christ-directed worship style model of fruitfulness abundance

In addition to a new conversion model informed by the fruitfulness abundance arising from the enthroned Christ, is a new worship style among the Brethren. Indeed when Jesus is on the throne, the self-interest dies, and the Holy Spirit takes over worship style dynamics in harmony with God’s plan for his church in missio Dei. Surely, fruits in abundance are the due outcome of the new model informed by the worship in Spirit dynamics (Galatians 5:22-23). The abundance of the fruit of the Spirit makes the worship not only lively, in the sense of the achieving love, joy, and peace of the Lord but also informs patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control. Truly, when the fruit of the Spirit takes centre stage of the believers’ life, there is neither hypocrisy nor legalistic rules of conduct in worship, but openness and responsible freedom of the praise and worship of the Lord.

In this way, as illustrated before, a reminiscent of God who encounters his people in the tabernacle and the temple (Ex 20:24) is brought to the fore, so much so that worshippers shout with joy that Immanuel, God with us (Isa. 7:14) is in their midst (Zeph. 3:17). Indeed, as demonstrated earlier in this chapter worship is an active response to God (Hattori, 1993:21) which is not only participative but is also a contextual human declaration of the worthiness of God. However, self-control, which is one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit must guard against showbiz evangelistic mission activity, which could attract all and sundry but not participate in the missio Dei. However, since ACK is keen on liturgical renewal as shown in the Our Modern Services prayer book, Brethren’s Fellowship liturgy should take cognizance of diverse public participation as a new model. The new model should depict response to God’s call to worship in the truth and the Spirit in fruitfulness abundance within the confines of the Great commission.
5.5.3 The Great Commission; basis for the changed world model of walking in the light

The theme of Christ on the throne continues to pervade the new model that demonstrates yielding of the believer’s (Brethren) interests to the Lordship of Christ. Indeed, as figure 10 shows, while the enthroned Christ directs the life of the believer about the Godhead (vertical dimension), the Great Commission (horizontal dimension) culminating in the changed world of walking in the light informed by changed perspectives of Brethren Christian witness and social responsibility. Fundamentally, the relationship between the Trinity and the Great Commission puts Trinitarian mission into perspective.

It was noted in chapter 2 that following the Willingen Conference of 1952, the mission came to be understood as flowing from the very nature of God, as God the Father sending the Son, and the Father and the Son sending the Spirit, and the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit sending the Church into the world (Bosch, 1991:390). The Trinitarian focus appears to have evaded Brethren’s mission appeal for they tended to avoid preaching from other members of Trinity except for the second person. Whereas there is no doubt that God affirmed His supremacy in missions by confirming supremacy of His Son, Jesus Christ as the conscious centre of the Church (Piper, 2001:133), there is a need, in the new model, to strike a balance, so that Brethren accommodate worship in the Spirit dynamics. Indeed, the baptizing formula in the making of disciples for all nations demonstrates Trinity.

Having said that, Matthew 28:18-20 argues Wright (2006:35,354), places the Great Commission as the biblical basis of mission in which Jesus commands his disciples to make disciples of the nations, having hitherto been restricted to the Israel borders, now the boundaries are actually extended wherever the gospel is proclaimed. This resonates with Ott et al. (2010:37) who observes the launch of the centrifugal movement of a mission to the nations as opposed to the centripetal mission of the OT. Indeed, Ott et al. (2010:36) regard go, baptize and teach as participles describing the imperative force, make disciples a fact observed by Wright (2006:35).

Following this, it is critical to debunk the mandate of the Great Commission. To dispense on its mandate from the viewpoint of new Brethren Fellowship, the concepts of go, baptizing and teaching as outlined by Ott et al. (2010:36) are vital. Therefore, while the term, goes, suggests an intention to bring the message to the nations and baptism (repentance and faith) a public initiation into the new kingdom community, teaching encompasses obedience to Jesus’ commands.

5.5.3.1 “Go” mandate of the Great Commission

Concerning the go mandate, Ott et al. (2010:36) embrace the centrifugal dimension, which is consistent with Wright (2006:213-14) who further links the Great commission with Abrahamic commission, go and be a blessing to all nations, which is covenantal and ethical, as to extend to others beside Abraham and his descendants. Indeed, if this model is to work for Brethren, a complete transformation is necessary, whereby centrifugal dynamics inform the perspective of mission as opposed to the old model of disciplining only their own as shown in chapter 4. Furthermore, being a blessing to other Christians and the general public is a covenantal command to go out there with the gospel of Christ that engages the life as a whole – both spiritual concerns and social responsibility within confines of the new model. Certainly, as Hastings (2012:155) observes the Great commission facilitates reconciliation of humans with God to enhance achieving of the cultural mandate in relational participation with God which informs Christian mission. Concerning this view, exclusiveness characteristics of the old model’s beliefs and practices of walking in the light should give way to the inclusiveness of the new paradigm. In other words, the command is strict to all and sundry places and social occasions that require the genuine gospel of Jesus Christ.

5.5.3.2 “Baptizing” mandate of the Great Commission

About baptism; this is essentially the Christian answer to the call of God into the body of Christ to become a child of God and heir to the kingdom of heaven (ACK, 2003:47). It resonates with Paul’s concept of crucifying the old self by burying it with Christ to be raised with Him in the newness of life (Romans 6:1-5). This explicit public declaration of conversion presupposes repentance and henceforth holding fast to the Christian faith. Indeed, early in this chapter repentance and faith were viewed as two legs on which conversion rests. While repentance has been seen as a change of mind, a conversion which influences the moral conduct (Strahler, 2010:21), faith embodies the primal confession Kyrios Iesous [Jesus is Lord] (Wright, 2006:106). For that reason, the new moral conduct lifestyle should confess the Lordship of Jesus informed by the love of God and neighbour, and not by legalistic stringent stereotyping born again testimony which is exclusive and apparently depicts disparaging moral codes.

Therefore, it is vital for Brethren in the new model to acknowledge that the new life in Christ is built on repentance, forgiveness of sins and in faith. Thus, it is not based on exclusive moral codes, but on a lifestyle that aspires informed growth in holiness. Indeed, the good news of salvation exhort that Jesus did not come to call the righteous, but sinners (Mark 2:17 5:32) to repentance (Lk 5:32). Certainly, the new model is of the view that neither Brethren nor any Christian should regard himself/herself as more righteous than the other. Indeed, it is a judicial act of God through Christ that Christians are made righteous. In other words, righteousness is a gift of God imputed in the regenerate’s new life of faith at justification. Thus, baptism in the new model is a full disclosure of the new birth and sanctification works of the renewing Spirit of God by faith, appropriated to the Brethren's changed world within the mission mandate of the Great Commission.

5.5.3.3 “Teaching” mandate of the Great Commission

Finally, the concept of instruction of the Great Commission is anchored in obedience to Jesus’ teaching which is not only transformative but also binding to the disciples as they call people to acknowledge and submit their lives to the Lordship of Christ (Ott et al., 2010:36). Indeed, the Great Commission text seems to echo the Abrahamic commission to go and be a blessing [Genesis 12:1-3] (Wright, 2006:213). Furthermore, Abraham (Gen. 22:16-18) serves as a model for the continuing education of his descendants who must walk in the way of the Lord in righteousness and justice so that God can accomplish the missional purpose of Abraham’s election (Wright, 2006:358). Therefore, the Great commission illustrates the command of the universal promulgation of the new covenant by the resurrected Christ (Wright, 2006:355) and has Deuteronomic undertones, “to observe everything that I have commanded you.” So, this corresponding teaching mandate appears to link the covenant presence of God among his people in the OT with the presence of Jesus among his disciples as they carry out the mission order.

This means the new model of the changed world within the Great Commission mandate embodies ethical teaching which transcends the confines of the covenant (Wright, 2006:214). So, concerning the new lifestyle informed by actual new moral codes, the transformative teaching of disciples goes beyond the boundaries of the Brethren’s weekly fellowship meetings. These teachings which are reckoned to be blessings to all and sundry are an integrated whole. At the one end of the continuum is the proper interpretation of scripture to avoid inappropriate application of biblical informed ethical codes of do’s and don’ts. The other end of the continuum teaches good conceptualization of salvation as to point out genuine born again testimony and daily walk in the light. Still, within the continuum is the inclusive and united fellowship that not only embrace spirit dynamism in worship but also engages social responsibility functions with other Christians as brothers and sisters in the Lord. The figure 11 below illustrates this changed world of walking in the light informed by knowing God and doing God’s will within the confines of the Great commission and faithful participants in the missio Dei.

The Figure 11 climaxes and concludes the teaching concept of the Great Commission in the changed world from the viewpoint of walking in the light. Whereas the sturdy buttressed trees line up the outstretched canopy providing a peaceful walk in the cool and well-lit shade, the lawn, undulated by the supporting lateral roots gives a picture of real life journey of knowing and doing God's will. On the one hand, walking under the shade depicts changing the world within the confines of the enthroned Christ, while on the other hand, the undulating surface demonstrates challenges that the disciple needs to negotiate in the course of training in righteousness (2 Timothy 4:16-17). Thus, while knowing God informs proper handling of scripture and the doctrine of salvation, doing God’s will addresses holistic Christian witness/making disciples and informed real social-ethical response to the needs of the neighbour. Therefore, in the changed world Brethren are exhorted not only to learn to walk in the light of God’s love but also to act the teaching (1 John 1:7).

5.6 CONCLUSION

The chapter focused on the missiological foundations used to critique tenets of walking in the light. It was divided into five parts. While the first part introduced the chapter, the second developed missiological foundations informed by a framework of Christian history, biblical theology, and Christian anthropology, which critiqued specific tenets - conversion, worship, and social-ethical responses. Whereas conversion mainly incorporated born again testimony, worship and social ethical comprised respectively, stereotyped worship style and moral codes.

Thirdly, it summarized the prevailing situation as it is today using historical and empirical analyses. This brought to the fore the validity and reliability of the research instrument used to conduct this study by comparing findings of the four select dioceses vis-à-vis the Diocese of Mbeere which had not participated in the actual research. Also, analysis of affinity between historical and empirical trends was examined to establish the status of the current trend.

Fourthly, the chapter summarized the prevailing socio-ethical situation as it should be in the perspective of the Anglican Church mission statement in Kenya, by demonstrating the Gospel of the transformation of the society mentally, physically, spiritually and socially. Fifthly, this study suggested a viable biblically based model of Missio Dei, which was illustrated through sequential models which summarized the prevailing situation as it was and as it should be.
CHAPTER 6. CONCLUSION AND WAY FORWARD

This chapter provides a summary of the viewpoints that arose from the study. It makes a compact summary of the conclusions as to draw a final conclusion on the crux of the investigation from which the researcher's own insights are clearly quantified. The chapter has clearly shown that the gaps in the literature have been filled, and the research objectives have been accomplished. Recommendations on further research have also been made.

6.1 SUMMARY OF VIEWPOINTS

The researcher has shown how qualitative research could be used to document information from primary and secondary sources. This method was not only necessary to analyze historical and empirical data of the present situation but also to work out a synopsis of relevant biblical and theological resources to recommend a preferred scenario. This could not have been possible without a feasible thesis statement which stated that Keswick teaching on the sanctification theology had been the catalyst behind the dominant socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in EARM. The thesis statement anchored the following viewpoints:

Firstly, the proposition that socio-historical circumstances provided affinity for Keswick theology of sanctification in the context of East Africa. Thus, to explore the affinity between the sociological circumstances and the Keswick theology, an exploration of a historical view of Keswick theology was critical. Indeed, to elucidate the concept of walking in the light, it was placed within the framework of missio Dei. Therefore, EARM seems to have not only contextualized much of its inheritance from Keswick theology expressed through practical holiness but have nevertheless taken a contextual perspective fashioning a theology with an African face.

Secondly, the view that the Anglican Church scholarship on Keswick theology brought to the fore in the current situation of the influence of Keswick theology on EARM socio-ethical beliefs and practices of walking in the light in the Anglican Church Mount Kenya region. The task incorporated an overview of the Anglican Church scholarship from the perspective of historical literature and documents on the one hand, and the findings and the analysis of the current situation on the other. A summary of the prevailing situation as it is today using historical and empirical analyses were necessary to bring to the fore the validity and reliability of the research instrument used to conduct this study. This was done by comparing findings of the four selected dioceses vis-à-vis the Diocese of Mbeere which had not participated in the actual research.

Thirdly, the perspective that the core missiological tenets provided a platform to analyze the prevailing practices of walking in the light. Thus, to give historical-missiological perspectives on the current situation, an exegetical study was done on some of the key biblical texts related to beliefs and practices of walking in the light. Further, the view that evangelical Anglican tradition not only informed the researcher’s theoretical framework to analyze scriptural teachings related to sanctification but also, brought to the fore new EARM’s models of the theology of sanctification.

Fourthly, the opinion that the missiological foundations informed by a framework of Christian history, biblical theology, and Christian anthropology, were essential features to critique particular tenets of walking in the light - conversion, worship, and social-ethical responses. This viewpoint did not only summarize the prevailing socio-ethical situation as it should be from the perspective of the Anglican Church mission statement in Kenya, but also suggested a viable biblically based model of Missio Dei.

6.2 SYNTHESIS OF OWN INSIGHTS OF MOVING FROM THE CURRENT TO PREFERRED SCENARIO

In order to draw a final synthesis, it is critical to bring to the fore viewpoints that inform undertakings from the current to the preferred trend of walking in the light in EARM. The aspects of the prevailing trend of walking in the light have by and large not only been contentious but also exclusive. This is cognizant of the fact that Brethren seem to focus more on the outward conformity informed by experiential sanctification than an inward renewal of the regenerate achieved through the power of the Holy Spirit. A focus on the justification as evidence of sanctification does permit not only mutual inclusive lifestyle within Brethren but also with other Christians. Thus, to accurately synthesize insights gleaned from this study, an integrated framework of beliefs and practices of walking in the light would suffice to move from the current situation to the preferred scenario.

The argument of this study has been Keswick theology of sanctification had been the catalyst behind the prevailing socio-ethical influence of walking in the light in EARM which appeared to some extent to inform both the historical and empirical viewpoints of the current trend. This trend, which seems to embody beliefs and practices of walking in the light from the perspectives of born again testimony, exclusive worship, and consequent moral codes seem to incorporate Brethren’s whole life from conversion to the end of earthly life.

The fact that some defining features of early Keswick teachings like exclusive lifestyle and devotional reading of the Bible find affinity with EARM’s lifestyle suggests not only some favourable socio-historical environment but also somewhat dry orthodoxy propounded by the mainstream Protestant churches in East Africa. Thus, while the daily life circumstances and experiences in East Africa milieu led to the accommodation of Keswick teachings of two sets of Christians - the born again and the ordinary - the maxim of walking in the light came to be the due consequence. These dictums appear to be reinforced by some consistent trends of exclusive coexistence rather than an inclusive one.

6.2.1 Synthesis of insights on current scenarios; exclusive beliefs and practices of walking in the light

Indeed, public confession of sin as was taught by Keswick movement seemed to have found familiar ground in the East African setting of vomiting out the evil spirits. Hereafter, need to walk in the light could have made sense as a way to achieve a not guilty verdict of sin. This bonding of Keswick theology with East African sociological circumstances no doubt led to the emergence and growth of EARM with remarkable higher life undertones. Thus, while Brethren appear to put their trust in a panoply of God’s righteousness informed by daily sanctification as a defense against the adversaries, they nonetheless segregate themselves from other Christians. This tendency seems to entrench perspectives prone to exclusiveness even within Brethren Fellowship. As a consequence, Kufufuka’s pompous viewpoint that other members of EARM are sleeping and needed to arise formalized a formidable split within EARM in Kenya to date.

Indeed, Jesus’ inclusive mission model appears impossible for Kufufuka, who seems to exclude not only other Christians but other Brethren as well. While Jesus’ mission design brings to the fold all and sundry, Kufufuka sanctimoniousness appears to blur missiological dynamics in the church. Indeed, Kufufuka as other members of Brethren, seems to have radically relegated justification as the basis of salvation and elevated experiential sanctification, rendering noncompliance ineligible for Brethren membership. The Brethren’s practical social convention has strengthened a rigid mindset that sets boundaries for Brethren’s code of conduct, without which indecorum arises. Following this disposition Brethren’s exponential growth has continued to dwindle as they seem old-fashioned and out of touch with the Anglican Church of Kenya’s worship dynamism. In this regard, Brethren are sleeping and need to awake to the reality of inclusive, dynamic worship in the Anglican Church of Kenya today, the Kigoco experience.

Thus, exclusive dissensions with the power to set norms of inclusion and exclusion from the fellowship have rendered Brethren a community living on the edge looking over the shoulders of the ones excluded while marking the boundaries for the included. This sanctimoniousness has not only tended to put some members of Brethren on a collision course with clergy but has also denied themselves chances of being frontrunners in the evangelism activities of the Anglican Church of Kenya. Furthermore, the acclaimed perception that the majority of Kenyan Anglican bishops are Brethren might be superficial, considering their attendance to the Brethren fellowship.
Moreover, most Brethren are uncomfortable with religious institutions which they accuse of producing graduates who they perceive unsaved, who depict unstructured format of giving testimony. Furthermore, Brethren view the Anglican Church from the perspective of compliance Christianity or as lukewarm which is neither hot nor cold. The affinity of conversion experience is outstanding for Brethren because they believe in a born-again process and development that elevates them above other Christians.

This sectarian-like scenario of a belief system is not only introverted but more so considers itself pompous. Although Brethren’s calling is to a large extent clear and sacrificial, their stagnant liturgical growth does not only endanger their future survival but appears inconsistent with the principle of participation in the missio-Dei. Moreover, Brethren’s emphasis on beliefs and practices of walking in the light not only betrays their focus on their central tenet, the cross of Christ but also tends to undermine the gospel for the perceived poor (in spirit), who by Brethren’s legalistic discipline locks them out of fellowship. Thus, Brethren’s lifestyle depicts a superiority phenomenon to what might be termed injurious to mutual societal coexistence. Indeed, Mfuko wa Bwana has not only bolstered their inclusive tenets but also shut options for welfare economic activities. Therefore, self-elevated social disposition appears not only hypocritical but also ironical considering the majority are illiterate.

Furthermore, the tendency to elevate the new birth through outward performances overshadows and compromises the inward change. Thus it looks ironical and hypocritical that while Brethren seems to exhibit a great salvation experience, they nevertheless seem missio homo. The apparent stereotyping of the “saving faith” by Brethren appears to disregard justification, which together with adoption are works of God in the believer after regeneration. BCP inclination to response rather than listening to God seems to buttress Brethren response to the call more than listening to God. Thus Brethren’s liturgical worship has largely been reclusive rather than being directed to the worship of God. However many Brethren would wish to maintain its social-ethical codes of walking in the light it should be mindful of other Christians, who due to strict moral codes have shied away from the Revival Fellowship family.

Following this, it would be an exercise in futility if Brethren’s practical holiness achieved through the dictums of walking in the light were not faithful participants in missio Dei. Therefore, it is critical for Brethren to work towards Godly driven missionary tasks because the mission of God does not follow Brethren, but Brethren should follow or participate in the mission of God. The preferred scenario ought to be Brethren missio logoi of mission achieved from the viewpoints of the centrifugal and centripetal mission.
6.2.2 Synthesis of insights on preferred scenario; inclusive beliefs and practices of walking in the light

Brethren, ought to advocate for mutual sharing with clergy. In this way, a Brethren member who is authentically Anglican who not only revere the Bible but is also versed with its interpretation dynamics will be the preferred model. Indeed, moderate Calvinism ecclesiology provides for the sufficiency of the Cross for the justified sinners, who though they may not share Brethren’s legalistic Code, are Christians just like Brethren. Such an inclusive concept would see more Anglican Brethren Bishops in Kenya and a more unbiased practical holiness.

Also, liturgical renewal would encourage Brethren to arise from hypocritical dispositions as to allow flexibilities because not everything that is worldly is sinful. Dynamic worships, well guided, become pointers of expressing the various gifts that God has endowed the church. That being the case, biblical and theological education should not be worrisome to the Brethren, though theologies should be vetted to avoid extremes.

In light of this conviction, self-interest on the part of Brethren should take a back-seat by accommodation of different ways of expressing salvation, within the covenant of grace and faithful participation in the missio Dei. In order to reflect the maxims of a worshipping community, Brethren fellowship meetings should mirror, within the Anglican evangelical structures, the very nature of God as envisioned in the missio Dei.

Indeed, one of the ways to culture other believers is through well-informed testimonies and inclusive evangelistic fellowships, which Brethren should cultivate. If Brethren could embrace theological studies, in addition to their commitment to fellowship meetings, they could be an excellent source of social-ethical codes of inclusion that would inform mission. Indeed, Brethren’s exclusive love for one another is something to be endeared and a profound missiological principle based on the centrality of the Cross. If this concept of brotherly-sisterly love extends to other Christian’s, then mission in the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region, will not only enhance its participation in the missio Dei but also place Brethren at the very centre of centripetal-centrifugal mission dynamics.

For Brethren to have an active mission, it ought not only appropriate dynamic equivalent cultural components but also have them creatively contextualized in their fellowship meetings. Certainly, Brethren are quick to inculturate some African cultural elements, which could boost missiological anthropology mission perspectives of African Christians who practise circumcision. Furthermore, Brethren expects a converted person to demonstrate clear characteristics of the new life in the same way a circumcised person is supposed to depict maturity and responsibility. This identity formation unfortunately fostered ethical codes of conduct within Brethren, yet if well guided to ensure freedom with responsibility could surely motivate an informed Brethren anthropological mission in the missio Dei.

Furthermore, mission strategies informed by talented Christian musicians and vibrant modern public address systems have led to somewhat entertaining worship and open-air crusades. Indeed, the ACK mission statement reminds worshippers that it is all about holistic Christian family response to God’s gift of adoption following justification. Surely, charismatic fervour in the ACK has brought outstanding liturgical renewal that allows for corporate and personal prayers, mostly within the Anglican tradition. However, there is challenge in spiritual growth illustrated by a high level of dichotomy about believers associating with one political party as opposed to the other, with consequent spates of post-election violence in the recent past.

Nonetheless, ACK mission of transformative gospel not only incorporates all Christians but leaves the door open for the Gospel to influence non-Christians. Certainly, the fundamental goal of the mission is not just Christian conversion, but also responsible coexistence with one’s neighbour. This means sanctification, which is evidence of justification, should be understood as the achieving of God’s renewing spirit that informs believers’ growth in holiness as they humbly respond by loving God and neighbour. So, experiential sanctification should express a mutual relationship with God reflected in the holistic mission which equips and transform the society with the Gospel. Indeed, the pilgrimage method of sharing a testimony regarding past, present and future which is hypocritical should change to incorporate not only social action to the needy neighbour but also to fellowship with other Christians and enquirers. Surely, since the mission of ACK is to equip and change people to take part in the church mission within missio Dei, it is pivotal that Brethren should allow worship style that does not only inform inclusive participation but is also compliant with missio Dei. While it is critical to observe acceptable Christian social convention, social welfare activities should take precedence because of their concern for entire community, not a supercilious minority group.

Undoubtedly, if Brethren would shelve their self-interest as to express salvation within the covenant of grace, then their faithful participation in the missio Dei is conceivable. Thus, the new model should depict response to God’s call to worship in the truth and the Spirit in fruitfulness abundance within the confines of the Great Commission. The holier-than-thou predisposition of Brethren is replaced with the self-effacing or modest conceptualization of conversion and worship style which informs beliefs and practices of walking in the light. Thus, the maxims of the born again testimony in the new model is a full disclosure of the new birth and sanctification works of the renewing Spirit of God by faith, appropriated to the Brethren’s changed world within the mission’s mandate of the Great Commission.
6.3 GAPS IN THE LITERATURE

Keswick theology as rightly put is scarcely known by the majority of the research respondents which may confirm Ward’s assertion that Keswick teachings did not influence EARM. However, while concurring with Ward, it is however apparent that most of the respondents in the field research conducted in early 2016 were ignorant of Keswick teachings in their participation in the mission of God. Nonetheless, the outcome of the historical and empirical research proves that there are some outstanding consistencies between Keswick teachings and EARM beliefs and practices of walking in the light. The following features suffice to indicate the gaps in the literature.

6.3.1 EARM Convention

Scholars appear to have failed to notice the apparent influence of the Keswick convention on the EARM concept of a yearly meeting. Indeed, while it is clear that typical Keswick week form of assembly has been replicated in East Africa in the format it had been done in Keswick England since 1875, it appears no scholar has documented this influence. Although, the seven days Keswick week has been reduced to three, and the topics profoundly changed to focus more on evangelism than hitherto countering the sin principle, the yearly convention has endured to the current situation. Indeed a document by Mutembei (2012) demonstrates the consistency of EARM's annual conventions over the years. Despite the obvious frequency of the convention epochs on East African soil, no scholars to the best of researcher’s knowledge have documented this historical development, in which experiential theology is entrenched, and from the viewpoint of missio Dei. Certainly, this study has brought to the fore sanctification theology as taught and applied by the Brethren to the detriment of the mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya.

6.3.2 Doctrine of justification

Concerning the doctrine of justification, some scholars like Andrew Naselli (Naselli, 2010:224-229) have written on it concerning Keswick theology, but no scholars have looked at this doctrine about EARM in the missio Dei. Consequently, the subject of the doctrine of justification which is God’s work in the believer following regeneration has led to Brethren’s perverse neglect, albeit ignorantly, of its primary role in salvation. Thus, Brethren have continued to drum for sanctification theology, as they understand it, oblivious to the fact that it is the evidence of justification. As a consequence, experiential sanctification or practical holiness pervades Brethren fellowships unabated from local convention to East African level. This study has bridged this gap by showing the primacy of justification in the daily life of sanctification of the members of the Brethren. Indeed attendant to this gap is pivotal to Brethren unity amongst themselves and with other Christians as they achieve the tenets of the Great Commission as faithful participants in the mission of God.

6.3.3 Born again testimony

The born again concept is central to belief and practices of walking in the light, which unlike the convention and justification factors above, appears to have been fashioned by factors within East African soil. The fact that scholars have not investigated the various components that comprise born again testimony have entrenched Brethren beliefs and practices of walking in the light culminating to dissension among Christians. This is in spite of scholars like John Karanja who have researched widely on the socio-cultural concept of public confession of evil deeds (Karanja, 2012:145-148), which could have influenced public confession of sin within Brethren circles. Indeed, born again testimony informed by public confession of sin and consequent daily walk with the Lord or practical holiness have been reinforced through the three-fold method of saying testimony. The ensuing format of past, present, and future characterize typically born again testimony which not only sets boundaries between Brethren and non-Brethren but also sets outs dictums of futuristic undertones. Thus, this study has dispensed with the born-again concept and adequately bridged the gap in the literature which had severely affected Brethren participation in the missio Dei.

6.3.4 Eschatological undertones

The apparent doctrine of last things has been propounded by scholars of early Keswick theology and appears to have some bearings on EARM’s inclination towards futuristic comfort. However, this discourse is strikingly missing from the EARM academics, in spite of its significant influence in the born-again testimony. Indeed, the Stand firm concept derived from Ephesians 6:13 which has been translated by Brethren to mean standing firm against perceived evil forces now or in the future, appears to inform what could be termed moderate eschatological view. Nonetheless, though one of the commonest songs in the Fellowship meetings, kaza mwendo, ndugu yangu, Yesu yuaja kutusukua (be steadfast, my friend, Jesus is coming back to take us home) appears to confirm the eschatological trend, Brethren seem to envisage future within their lifetime. Thus, the preceding insinuates Christ’s second coming and is the engine behind Brethren’s struggle to maintain the stereotyping and holier-than-thou stand in the guise that they are destined to face persecution then and in the indefinite future. Although, this theological narrative has been missing in the existing literature on EARM, it has nevertheless been brought to the fore in this study within the context, mission of God.
6.4 RESEARCH OBJECTIVES

The research objective of this study was to investigate the contribution of Keswick theology of sanctification to the socio-ethical understanding of walking in the light in the EARM, which to a large extent influenced the mission of the Anglican Church, Mount Kenya region. In order to achieve this objective, specific objectives were used to evaluate the impact of the ensuing beliefs and practices of walking in the light. But, while Keswick theology appears to have been the catalyst behind the beliefs and practices of walking in the light, other factors seem to have influenced the current situation. Therefore, the research objective appears to have accomplished its task as depicted by the following deductions derived from the specific objectives outlined in chapter 1.

Regarding the first objective which was to determine the socio-historical circumstances that led to the influence of Keswick theology on the current trend has been demonstrated in chapter 2. Indeed, the study has established that Keswick theology of sanctification found affinity with East African socio-historical circumstances which enabled Keswick theology and East Africa sociological worldview to have some significant exchange of concepts and meanings. While most external and internal conditions and experiences of the socio-historical situation in East Africa were attracted to Keswick teachings of exclusion and inclusion, some aspects like a public confession of sins have been African distinctive. Certainly, African tradition of public confession of evil has been peculiarly African and could only have been adopted in the dictums of walking in the light in EARM.

The second objective concerned investigation of the current Anglican Church scholarship with reference to Keswick theology of sanctification and walking in the light. The study found that Anglican Church scholarship has mainly explored EARM from historical, cultural and theological perspectives. Whereas some scholars like Kevin Ward (Ward, 2012:4) and Joe Church (Church, 1981:157-159) have scarcely linked EARM with Keswick theology, John Karanja (Karanja, 2012:143-151) and Esther Mombo (Mombo, 2012:153-161) have not documented any scholarship on its influence on the walking in the light, particularly in the Mount Kenya region. This propensity is consistent with the fact that majority of respondents (see chapter 3) depicted ignorance of Keswick theology. Consequently, other factors like classical Evangelical revivalism of the late 19th century, Pentecostalism and the born-again culture with the strict religious position, have been cited.

The third objective examined the basic missiological tenets and practices of walking in the light in which it was established that the missiological principles explicated in chapter 4 had positively impacted beliefs and practices of walking in the light in EARM. As a consequence, the missiological principles were found to challenge the walking in the light fundamentals of born again testimony, spirit dynamics, and moral codes to inspire Brethren's participation in the mission of God.

Concerning the fourth objective which was to explore missiological foundations required to critique particular tenets of walking in the light in EARM, a three-legged concept of church history, biblical theology, and anthropology illustrated in chapter 5 were used to answer the quest of this objective. The analysis was done through the scaffolding matrix of born again testimony, stereotyping worship, and moral codes. Indeed, these elements of walking in the light when critiqued against the missiological foundations undeniably fell short of the mission mandate of participation in the missio Dei due to hypocrisy, legalism and exclusive disposition.

Concerning the fifth objective that explored how Keswick theology influenced walking in the light in the Anglican Church, the following inference was observed. While it is true that Keswick theology appears to have affected walking in the light in the Anglican Church, the majority respondents except prominent stakeholders seemed ignorant of the Keswick teachings. Nevertheless, the apparent thematic consistencies between the historical survey and the current trends (chapter 5) support prominent stakeholders’ viewpoints and thus appear to suggest some heritage of Keswick theology. Furthermore, to some extent devotional reading of scripture which seems to inform splits and two Christian scenarios, seem to display Keswick distinctive.

Relating to the final objective which was to determine significant consequences of walking in the light for the mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya, the ACK mission statement anchored the discourse. Indeed, ACK mission statement was found to equip and transform the community with the Gospel of Christ. Consequently, when the current trend was placed against the mission statement, it was noted that the prevailing situation of walking in the light had hindered mission in the Anglican Church of Kenya. Thus, chapter 5 shows that ACK mission demonstrates the preferred scenario that embraces both evangelism and social responsibility as a single unit and informs holistic Christian life. This suggests a change on the part of Brethren from exclusive to the inclusive predisposition of mutual Christian’s coexistence.

6.5 RECOMMENDATIONS FOR FURTHER RESEARCH

2. The apparent disconnection between scholarship on Keswick theology and EARM, yet there are compelling conceptual similarities.

3. Historical and theological foundations of Arise and Stand factions within EARM.
4. Anglican Church scholarship apathy on EARM beliefs and practices of walking in the light.

5. Anglican evangelicalism and mission praxis in the ACK.

8.1 ANNEXURE 1: FACTIONS IN THE EARM

Arahuka (Arise): This group is popularly known in Kiswahili as Kufufuka or Kuzuzuka which Nthamburi (1991:117) argues originated in 1935 from Blasio Kigozi who challenged the sleeping church of Uganda to wake up. The concept, wake up, was derived from a text in Ephesians 5:14, “Wake up O sleeper, rise from the dead and Christ will shine upon you.” The members understood this text to mean the spirituality of the mission church was dead and thus to wake up meant to rise from dead and consequently to associate with Arise group. So members of this movement detached themselves from the mission church and social activities claiming that getting involved meant one is spiritually dead. Their interpretation of the text led to their distinctive beliefs and practices. For instance, members are forbidden to obtain loans from banks, take items from the shop on credit, receive or give a bride price, adopt children, take life insurance and keep dogs. Being involved in such activities mean that one is spiritually dead. Group members are serious in tithe within the movement in support of their operations.

Simama (Stand): Simama is a Swahili word for Stand and refers to members who have stood firm in the revival in the waves of the split. This is the biggest group and is actively involved in evangelism in the church. Its adherents argue that they have stood firm in their faith in Christ in the sense of being the original revival members, i.e., they call themselves Simama na Yesu (stand firm in Jesus). They cooperate with the church and appear to emphasize their theology rather than an interpretation of scripture. They have no particular biblical text for reference.

Mtama na Maji (Sorghum and water): The origin of Mtama na Maji is traced from a convention held at Taita, Kenya in 1960 whose theme was “give us nothing but vegetables to eat and water to drink” (Daniel 1:8f). The members sought to live like Daniel and the young men in the king’s palace. So, they emphasized simple lifestyle by wearing simple clothing and eating simple food. To them, high living is defilement from the king’s devilish palace. As a result, they do not take part in church leadership, Holy Communion or Church functions like fundraising. These are king’s foodstuff and should be avoided. Other elements to avoid are expensive gowns, cakes, cars, bridal attires, flowers and any decorations in their wedding forums. Outward performances appear to inform their spirituality.

Thama (leave): The origin of this schism finds its origin from a convention held at Murang’a, in central Kenya in 1957, whose theme was to leave, derived from Genesis 12:1. At the end of the convention, the idea of leaving was misunderstood to mean leaving their unsaved family members, clans and friends. This split the EARM with one group emphasizing leaving one’s sinful life and the other insisting on physically leaving their relatives and property because, to them, they were a hindrance to salvation. This group has died, and little is heard of it. However, its teaching has not died away completely.

Kupaa (Rising up): This small group split from Arise and claimed to be more saved than merely Kufutuka. They were so completely detached from the world and its affairs and were in the glory train to heaven. Due to their small membership in Kirinyaga County, they have joined Simama (Stand) group, the largest in the county. Their teachings are similar to those of Arahuka (Arise) and are active particularly in Embu, Kenya.

Evaluation of the collected data from the four select dioceses against the Diocese of Mbeere

The above data from Mbeere Diocese (MD) is collated along with the perspectives of the notations and is compared with constructed themes (see chapter 3) accruing from the four Select Dioceses (SD). Surely, the themes ensuing from MD resonates with those from SD which suggest that the research instrument was valid and reliable. These themes are outlined below.

On the theme of Born again testimony the SD put forward a three-fold ways which echo that of MD. While the beginning of a testimony encompasses full disclosure of identity, the middle comprises confession of past sins followed by the restitution and forgiveness, and the ending illustrates journey with the Lord Jesus.

As regards acquaintances with EARM’s precursor, whereas the majority of Brethren in the SD except prominent stakeholders were not aware of Keswick theology, MD reported 100% ignorance. Thus, some respondents from the SD and MD associated influences of the prevailing situation to other sources.

Concerning Scriptural verses believed to have caused a split, while both SD and MD displayed texts from both Testaments, MD relied only on the New Testament, specifically from the gospels. However, biblical texts propounded by both SD and MD inform the split and subsequent moral code.

On the subject of other causes of the split, while some SD and MD respondents had no idea, others linked it to leadership squabbles and to open confession of sin.

About splits, SD and MD are in agreement that the ensuing moral codes have had adverse effects on the Mission of Anglican Church in Kenya.

Regarding what change they would recommend to the current trend, most respondents in both SD and MD expressed the need for an all-inclusive and diversified church that allows balanced reciprocating social, ethical dynamics of mission and ministry.
